Flags display pride in America

BY SARAH BAHARI
Kansas State Collegian

American flags line the streets of downtown Manhattan. They decorate the hallways of schools, are draped over balconies and fly from porches and cars.

American flags are everywhere.

"It makes me happy," third-grader Eli Harmon said. "Proud to be an American 'cause we have a free country."

Harmon's class at Bluemont Elementary School made flags out of paper, crayons and colored pencils after the terrorist attacks on the World Trade Center and the Pentagon.

The students agreed that making the flags made them feel better.

"It made me feel good that the people who were hurt knew we cared," third-grader Isaac Guy said.

Seeing the American flag isn't just therapeutic for children.

Derek Craig, sophomore in management information systems, helped paint the flag on the windows of Goodnow Hall. He said it united people.

"I think since the flag is a symbol of what America stands for, it's brought everybody together," he said. "It's a common bond to fight for America."

It also brought the hall together on a Saturday morning, Craig said. A few people set the dimensions and taped off where to paint, and about 25 students painted the red, white and blue onto lobby windows.

So far, the flag has received positive feedback, Craig said.

"A lot of people were emotionally affected by what happened," he said.

"We've had a lot of people come in and remark about their enjoyment of it."

Robyn Reed, senior in social sciences, said symbols of America, including the flag, have taken on more profound meanings.

"More than anything, it symbolizes freedom and growth," she said. "From where we've come from two flags to one, from 13 stars to 50. It's just progression."

Reed has been singing the national anthem since the eighth grade. The first time she sang it — in her school talent show, three days before the Persian Gulf conflict began — she wore red, white and blue.

Singing it meant a lot then, she said. It means even more now.

Nicholas Miller, junior in hotel and restaurant management, said people should show respect for their country at all times — not just in times of crisis.

Miller recently served in the U.S.

Navy and said he is glad the armed forces are getting the respect they deserve.

"It takes something like this to make us realize how important they really are," he said. "If it wasn't for these men and women, people couldn't be at the bars having fun. They wouldn't be able to enjoy the same freedoms."

Barry Sarvis, owner of Barry's Drug Center on Poyntz Avenue, said the flag is a reminder of what America stands for.

"The strength and unity of the country," he said. "It represents freedom, the ideas for which we stand."

Police search for man linked to money trail

BY LARRY MARGASAK
The Associated Press

WASHINGTON, D.C. — Authorities pursued terrorism suspects in Europe and the Middle East on Monday, arresting several and searching for a man from the United Arab Emirates whom they said could be a key figure in the money trail.

While the arrests and interrogations spread from country to country, three college students were transferred from San Diego to New York for questioning, and a U.S. magistrate in Alexandria, Va., ordered a man and woman to be kept without bond.

The two in Virginia were charged with helping some of the Sept. 11 hijackers obtain false identification documents. The students were detained as material witnesses, suspected of having ties to two hijackers who lived in San Diego last year.

In the effort to pin down how the hijackers were financed, U.S. authorities believe they've traced wire transfers from one of the terrorists to Mustafah Ahmed, who disappeared the day of the attacks and is being sought by the FBI for questioning.

Mohamed Atta, a suspected leader of the hijacking teams, received $100,000 sent from Pakistan, said a law enforcement source speaking on condition of anonymity.

On Sept. 8 and Sept. 9, just days before the attacks, Atta wired money to Ahmed, the source said.

Investigators believe Atta, who is thought to have been the pilot of one of the planes that hit the World Trade Center in New York, might have been sending back unused money from the hijacking plot.

Some $6 million has been blocked and 50 bank accounts frozen as countries around the globe join the U.S. effort to stop the flow of money to terrorist networks, President Bush

AMERICAN TRAGEDY

An American flag sits atop Manhattan Hill. The flag has become an important emotional and patriotic symbol for the nation after the attacks Sept. 11 in New York and Washington, D.C.

What does the American flag mean to you?

"It's a symbol of patriotism to the United States. It's a representation of the United States' strength."

Travis Digrolamo, sophomore in business

"It symbolizes freedom and what life is meant to be like. It shows everyone is equal in the land."

Josh Hodden, waitress at restaurant

"It means a lot of things. I joined the military because of it, or part of it. It makes you proud. It's something to stand for."

Johnnie Parker, sophomore in hotel and restaurant management

"It's a symbol of freedom. It's a symbol of freedom that we don't have to live under an oppressive government. Since the attacks, now it's a symbol of patriotism and of unity, showing that we are one."

Sara Hupp, freshman in history

"Freedom, togetherness. It's something really important. Like when we wanted to free ourselves from Britain, it was like, 'This is my flag. It's my freedom. It's mine.'"

Teresa Scott, freshman in business

"Basically, freedom — freedom in its basic form."

CASA plays role of advocate for children

BY MICHAEL WATSON
Kansas State Collegian

Funding sources

Funding sources for the Sunflower CASA Project:

- United Way
- Kansas Permanent Families Fund
- Crime Victim Assistance Fund
- City of Manhattan
- Private donations

The women of Kappa Alpha Theta also provide funds to CASA through their WildKat Chase 5K Run/Walk. This year's event is scheduled for Sunday. The entrance fee to run or walk is $15.

Emily Staggemore, senior in management and philanthropy chair, said there are usually 350 to 400 runners in the event and $3,500 to $4,500 is raised and donated to CASA in Riley County. Volunteers:

Of the 45 CASA volunteers in Riley County, about 60 percent are K-State students. In 2000, the Riley County CASA volunteers donated 1,765 hours of time and drove 7,195 miles on their cases.

Each year, judges determine the fate of more than 500,000 abused, neglected or abandoned children.

For these children, finding a safe and permanent home is the most important thing.

Court Appointed Special Advocates, CASA, was created in 1977 because many judges felt they did not have the time to make an educated guess for where their permanent home should be.

Ashley Becker, senior in elementary education and CASA volunteer, said she traveled to a foster home to visit two young children who had been given to the state by their mother when they were brought into CASA at ages two and three.

The case she advocated was the mother's petition to regain custody of the children.

"It's hard to see that some kids aren't brought up in the same way that you were brought up," she said.

"It's hard to see that they don't have the unconditional love that I experienced."

The children now are ages five and six, and they are living with a grandparent. This was Becker's recommendation to the court, because the grandparent could provide a more stable home for the children.

The national CASA program was created when a judge in Seattle realized he only could spend 15 minutes per case, which is not enough to determine the best home for the child.

CASA volunteers spend more time with the children, social workers, psychologists and the SRS to make the best recommendation to the judge. The judges then determine the best permanent home for the child.

Jayne Morris-Hardeman, advocate supervisor, said CASA recommendations are valued. They are independent, non-biased observations.

"The volunteers gather information and provide a written report for the judge telling them what would be in the best interest of the child," she said.

"They also provide support for the child."

Becker said she would read to her children for whom she was advocating. She also would talk to them and ask questions about what was going on in their lives. She said she would spend a lot of time playing games and having fun.

Executive Director Melanie Brockington said the average case is 12 to 18 months long, a long time in the life of a child.

"A lot of the kids that we help are in foster care," Brockington said.

"We want to find them a loving home. Many have been in multiple foster homes and have been uprooted from their own room, bed and school. We want to make sure that children have a permanent, safe home environment. We want them to find that as soon as possible."

While the Sunflower CASA Project serves Riley and Clay counties, they are trying to start a project in Pottawatomie County. They are looking for volunteers for that project.

Becker said volunteering is a great learning experience. "Volunteering is a great way for social work students to see what it is like," she said.

"You learn a lot about how the court functions. It's been a great experience, and I have learned a lot."

Union Food Court implements changes in response to thefts

BY DANA STRONGIN
Kansas State Collegian

New anti-theft measures took full effect in the K-State Student Union Food Court on Monday.

Students no longer are given fast food bags at their respective counters. Instead, sacks are available at cash registers.

"We did it because students were stuffing extra items like drinks in their sacks," said Gina Kimble, program director for the Union Program Council.

Kimble was monitoring the area by the drinks between Burger King and Taco Bell.

"We did it for a while last year, and we are just starting it this year," she said.

Kimble said managers of the Union will monitor the area a couple times a week.

"We will monitor for about a month, and if theft decreases, we may stop monitoring," she said.

Lines were of standard length, but students didn't seem to be little confused, Kimble said.

Although complaints were heard among those waiting for their Taco Bell orders, not all students were upset.

"It doesn't bother me as long as I get to eat it," said Philip Ward, junior in music education.

Eric Braun, food service manager for the Union, said the setup was made in

STATE IN BRIEF

By The Associated Press

Change in welfare laws not hurting many Kansans

TOPEKA — Only a small number of Kansans are expected to lose their cash welfare benefits in the coming months because of changes in the federal law.

In October 1996, Congress set a 60-month lifetime limit on getting money from the Temporary Assistance to Needy Families program.

The Department of Social and Rehabilitation Services says that of the 13,349 families receiving cash assistance, about 300 will reach their 60-month limit during the 12 months following Monday's deadline.

But about 270 of those families are expected to be granted hardship exemptions, so they can continue receiving cash benefits, SRS Secretary Janet Schalansky said.

The state can grant time-limit hardship exemptions for up to 20 percent of all families receiving cash assistance.

The amount of cash assistance depends on family size. For a family of three, it's about $403 a month.

10-year-old boy charged with murder of infant girl

OLATHE — Authorities have charged a 10-year-old Johnson County boy with murder in death of an infant girl, making him perhaps the youngest in state history to face that charge.

The boy is in custody at the Johnson County Juvenile Detention Center on charges of first-degree felony murder and aggravated sodomy, Johnson County District Attorney Paul Morrison said Friday.

The 9-month-old girl died at her parents' Overland Park home Sept. 20 while the boy, whose name was not released, allegedly molested her, Morrison said. The two children are not related.

Morrison said the boy's feet literally did not touch the floor while he sat during a Thursday court hearing. He is scheduled to appear in court again Monday.

Social conservative Miller ponders run for governor

LAWRENCE — David Miller, the social conservative who sought the Republican nomination for governor in 1998 against incumbent Bill Graves, is considering running again next year.

"Over the three years since the last campaign, I've had a number of people ask me about it and urge me to look at it, and I'm in the process of doing that," Miller, of Eudora, told the Lawrence Journal-World. "I'm going to give it a lot of thought and prayer."

As chairman of the Kansas Republican Party, Miller led conservatives to control of the party apparatus. He then challenged Graves in the 1998 GOP primary, but was heavily outspent and lost by a nearly 3-to-1 margin.

Graves went on to win a second term in the general election and is barred from seeking another term. Moderates regained control of the Kansas Republican Party, and Miller later was embraced by the Kansas Republican Assembly, a conservative organization.

NATION IN BRIEF

By The Associated Press

Minnesota state workers on strike for more benefits

ST. PAUL, Minn. — The state's two largest public employee unions went on strike Monday in a dispute over wages and health benefits, idling as many as 28,000 employees.

Involving about half the state's workers, the strike would be the largest government work stoppage in the state's history and the first since a 22-day strike in 1981.

Employees involved in the action included highway maintenance workers, tax collectors, janitors, office clerks and parole officers. Those unaffected included state police officers, prison guards, state college teachers and forest firefighters.

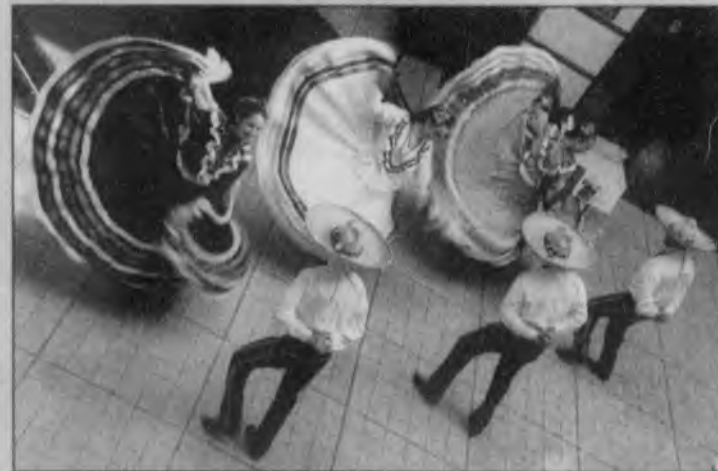

Gov. Jesse Ventura said in a statement that giving the unions more money would have resulted in service cuts and layoffs.

Supreme Court suspends Clinton's right to practice

WASHINGTON, D.C. — The Supreme Court opened its new term Monday with a rebuke of former President Clinton, suspending him from practicing law before the justices. Clinton was among 18 lawyers nationwide who got the same discipline.

The justices gave Clinton 40 days to say why he should not be permanently disbarred from practicing law before them. A Clinton lawyer said the former president would argue that high court disbarment would be inappropriate.

Clinton was admitted to the Supreme Court bar in 1977, but never has argued a case there. Most lawyers admitted there never do, but it is considered an honor.

In an effort to educate the campus, the Union Program Council Multicultural Committee is being host to its second annual Festival of Nations.

The first Monday of every month will celebrate a culture or ethnic group with entertainment and food.

On Monday, National Hispanic Awareness Month was celebrated with Mariachi dancers in the K-State Student Union.

Erica Smith, committee chair and junior in apparel marketing and design, said the crowd reaction was positive.

"They were saying the food was good and the dancing was good," she said.

Hispanic American Leadership Organization co-sponsored the event.

Essence Halliburton, junior in marketing and international business, said she attended the celebration to get a taste of another culture.

"I think it is important to educate ourselves about different cultures, especially since we live in such a diverse society," Halliburton said.

She said food and entertainment are an important part of culture, so it was interesting to get to taste authentic food and see an authentic dance performed.

"The food was excellent, and I thought it was cool when they brought people up to try to teach them the dance," Halliburton said.

Smith said the goal of the festival is to educate students about people different from them.

"We are trying to spread the diversity of different cultures," she said. "Basically, we want to make students aware of different ethnic groups."

Lou Douglas speaker discusses reviving U.S. labor union movement

BY TINA DEINES
Kansas State Collegian

The fight for fairness on the job, salary and company benefits started the labor movement before it eventually dwindled away. But society's lack of progression in the United States is proof that the movement needs to be re-established, Carl Rosen said.

Rosen, president of Chicago-based District 11, United Electrical, Radio and Machine Workers of America, spoke about "Putting the Movement Back in the Labor Movement" in the K-State Student Union's Forum Hall on Monday night as part of the Lou Douglas Lecture Series.

Rosen started by discussing the origin of unions.

"To make a real difference, we need to be leading the fight for all Americans, not just members. We need to be leading a social movement for all Americans," he said.

Rosen said unions are important because they speak for individuals.

"Unions are the only check on corporate power, he said. 'Individuals need unions to fight for fairness on the job, decent pay and benefits.'"

Unions are not only crucial to society, but also to creating and maintaining a healthy society, Rosen said.

In third world countries, he said, there is a tremendous gap between wealthy and poor people. Labor unions are a way of annihilating these consequences in the United States.

"Wealth in the '90s is in the hand of a relatively small section of society," Rosen said.

Rosen said prior to the '90s, there had been a shortening of the work week every two generations, and productivity improvements led to a higher standard of luxury for Americans. Now, he said, that is not the case.

Rosen also discussed the changes in the labor movement from the 1930s to today.

During the depression, he said, organizing labor unions was a way for people to eat and get the economy on its feet. President Franklin D. Roosevelt supported the Unions.

During the World War II era, unions were forced to move out of the public sector and focus only on its own members.

"The prominent effect of that was to drive labor out of its prominent role, and it did because they split, divided and weakened."

During the 1960s, union membership was discouraged. There was corruption and organized crime involved. Rosen described this time as the rotting out of the movement.

Into the 1980s, Rosen said, the labor movement basically fell. While President Ronald Reagan is frequently blamed for the fall, Rosen said there were many factors.

At this point there was no public support as the unions were viewed as only taking care of themselves and labor union membership in this time period dropped from 35 percent of the population to 13 percent.

Rosen said labor unions today have lost much of their abilities due to scare tactics put forth by corporations.

"They scare the hell out of people, and it's generally very effective," he said.

During the 1990s, Rosen said, the country was seeing the same kinds of gaps in pay that are visible in third world countries today.

With America no longer progressing as a society, Rosen said, the labor movement needs to be re-established.

"I would say we have to re-assert ourselves as a movement for economic and social movement for all Americans."

Rosen said that while the mean income of Americans has gone up in the past year, the median income has gone down.

Rosen ended the lecture by urging the audience to get involved with the movement by either participating in organizations or writing letters to newspapers and officials.

Sarah Sourk, junior in political science, said she thought Rosen presented the issue well.

"I thought it was a very good point of view and one that isn't well-known in Kansas," Sourk said.

Carl Rosen, president of the District 11, United Electrical, Radio and Machine Workers of America, based in Chicago, spoke at the second Lou Douglas Lecture of the 2001-02 academic year. The lecture was titled, "Putting the Movement Back in the Labor Movement" and was at 7 p.m. in Forum Hall. Evan Semón/Collegian

The K-State Student Union Food Court is forced to eat the losses of $300-500 per month, Bernard Pitts, Union director, said.

The Food Court is losing money because students are stealing food. The Food Court has taken a stand against stealing, and as of Monday, each individual business stopped separately bagging food. Instead, food bags now are given out at the cashier's stand.

If this action does not work to curb the theft problem, Pitts said they might have to install closed-circuit televisions to monitor students.

These thefts are an atrocity. K-State has instilled an honor system, which was developed to make sure academic work is preformed with honesty. Do we need to expand the honor system to include honesty in the Union as well? Stealing is childish and immature.

Because the food court is out money, they will need to curb those losses some how. That curbing will come down on the students. Ultimately, if you steal food and think you are getting away from it, you won't be. In the long run if the Union keeps losing money, they will raise prices, whether through increasing student fees or prices in the food court. Taking a small bite out of your wallet now will be less than a massive one later.

This is to the people who feel they need to steal food from the Union. You have angered the gods, and we are very, very upset.

Faculty should be specific when assigning classwork

Editor,
As Honor System Director, one of my duties is to report annually to Student Senate, Faculty Senate and to the Provost the Honor System's past year's activities and adjudicated cases.

Those reports are available at our Honor System Web page ksu.edu/honor; click on "Annual Reports." Just below "Annual Reports" on our Web page is "KSU Alleged Violations of the Honor Pledge," which describes the nature of each of the 55 cases reported to the Honor System during the 2000/2001 academic year.

One important problem regarding alleged Honor Pledge violations continues to reappear as a factor in numerous cases. That problem concerns both faculty and students and has to do with the specific expectations regarding a class assignment.

There have been cases where faculty syllabi either were unclear, ambiguously worded or did not mention the specific expectations of a particular assignment, often with respect to whether collaboration was permissible.

Honor Council hearing panels consider a syllabus to be a contract between faculty and students. Syllabi need to be unambiguous and sufficiently detailed so that what is unacceptable academic behavior is clear. Students should ask faculty to clarify their expectations on specific assignments, rather than make assumptions based on previous assignments or the modus operandi of other classes. Expectations vary from instructor to instructor and class to class.

Of the 91 students alleged to have violated the Honor Pledge, one-half were accused of some form of plagiarism. Some cases involved asking to see another's student's original work and then surreptitiously copying it. Other classes involved students blatantly accessing another student's computer files and stealing original work.

Perhaps the most typical type of plagiarism involves copying information from the Internet, although faculty also are adept at tracking down the same Internet source as the students. In other cases, faculty were tipped off by a suspicious escalation of scholarly ability not demonstrated in a student's previous work. Honor Council Hearing Panels tend to take a dim view of plagiarism and almost always assign an XP to students who have violated the Honor Pledge in that way.

Is the honor system working? I believe it is. Can it be improved? Of course it can be improved. The best way is for both faculty and students to make their understanding of the Honor System know by creating and expecting clear syllabi and by asking for clarification when syllabi or instructions are not clear. All of us can do our part in protecting the academic integrity of K-State.

There is a long-standing persecution in our world today. One with no national spokesman, relief campaign, help hotline or telethons. The origin in this conflict, though, is not about right and wrong. It's about right and left.

Left-handers, sometimes called lefties or southpaws, constitute less than 8 to 10 percent of the world's population. Lower numbers have left them subordinate to the dominant right-handed regime. At times, it's hard to be proud of such a gift.

Even the concept of leftness is seen as derogatory. Left-handed compliments are those that seem nice but have a hurtful intention. Talking out of the left side of your mouth has similar meanings. Even the word for left in Latin translates to "sinister."

With all this negativity toward those of the lefty persuasion, I feel compelled to vindicate my lefty brothers and sisters.

Left-handers struggle with the burden of living in a right-handed world. According to research by Stanley Coren, <http://psychology.unn.ac.uk/nick/HPLec08.htm> we die earlier than our right-handed counterparts.

Contributing to this is the stress of having to adapt our natural instincts to backward operation.

Frustrations over right-handed scissors, can openers and corkscrews have run high for years. Yet, there seems to be some technological boundary from designing such complicated devices.

The "Simpsons" character, and famed left-handed alumnus, Montgomery Burns, said it best when he exclaimed, "Damned infernal gizmo. My kingdom for a left-handed can opener!" Lefties have to get different golf

Power tools are especially dangerous for southpaws. Circular saws, drill presses and belt sanders have handles on the right side. It's dangerous to try to hold the power tool with your left hand while controlling the wood with your right. Hand-held jigsaws blow sawdust off to the right side. So if you hold it with your left hand, you get sawdust in your face.

It's amusing to watch varied writing styles of lefties. The creative wrist angles are necessary because if we write across from left to right, our hand smears fresh ink across the page.

When writing in a spiral notebook or a 3-ring binder, the metal coil rubs our hand raw. Thankfully, the availability of top-spiral binders has aided our cause for kinesthetic ease.

Lefties have little choice where they sit at large dinners, lest they bump elbows with a righty. We desperately search for left-handed desks in classes, only to be ostracized at the ends of rows. Despite such daunting odds to blend in with the rest of their peers, left-handers have very unique gifts and have managed to make their mark in society and over history.

According to Coren's studies, lefties often are more creative, stemming from our predominant right-brained orientation. We also tend to be more understanding, sympathetic and loving. We are artists, musicians, authors and actors. We are social workers, leaders and athletes.

So for those of you who grew up feeling alone and out of place, here are some men and women from the "Famous Left-Handers" Web site www.indiana.edu/~primate/left.html that have managed to make their mark on history with their left hand.

There have been seven left-handed presidents in history, including Herbert Hoover and Harry Truman. We also had left-handed presidents in office from 1980 to 1996. Yep, Ronald Reagan, George Bush and Bill Clinton to all were southpaws. George W. didn't take after his dad in that area.

On a more historical perspective, Alexander the Great held his sword in his left hand as he conquered most of the early European region. Joan of Arc, Napoleon Bonaparte, Julius Caesar and Egyptian pharaoh Ramses II also made their mark as southpaws.

history, including M.C. Escher, Michelangelo, Raphael and Pablo Picasso.

The list of southpaw musicians ranges from Bach to Seal. Jimi Hendrix restrung a right-handed guitar and learned to play it upside-down. Isaac Hayes, who is best known by our generation as Chef from "South Park," is left-handed in life and when animated.

Luke Skywalker might have lost his right hand in a swordfight in Star Wars, but it wouldn't have mattered much to actor Mark Hamill. He's left-handed. So is Tom Cruise, Lisa Kudrow, Kermit the Frog, Marilyn Monroe, Jerry Seinfeld and Oprah Winfrey.

With all of these famous southpaw alumni, one would think lefties would get more respect than we do. Instead, we still are seen as strangers in a strange land.

I think it's about time we revolt. Lefties aren't a minority. We're elite. It's time we organize and stand up for ourselves. We might write differently, but deep down we're just as good as the right-handed masses.

Just remember, if Rocky can make it as a lefty, anyone can.

Technology often overshadows nature's simplicity

While listening to the football game Saturday, I had a sudden revelation.

Somewhere between trying to figure out why on earth there were so many Fagans on the field and getting frustrated with the officials, it hit me: I live my life in an almost totally artificial environment.

Every morning, I wake up to the harsh, pulsing buzz of my alarm clock. When I finally manage to get out of bed, I stumble down the hallway to take a nice, hot shower before going to school. I generally listen to the radio or a CD to help me wake up.

After getting dressed in the least-filthy clothing I can find in the heap at the foot of my bed, I check my e-mail before heading off to class.

As I drive to school, I listen to whatever the radio is playing when I turn it on.

I sit all day in climate-controlled classrooms. Between classes, I go to the library or to a computer lab to check my e-mail and do my homework. I listen to music the whole time I'm there.

After class, I walk back to my air-conditioned car and drive back to my air-conditioned house. Most nights, I work in a nice, climate-controlled newsroom with a good Internet connection.

It's all very comfortable. And that's the problem.

These artificial environments insulate me from the outside world. They stifle nature's beautiful voice. They cut me off from some of the simplest and most lovely things in life.

I'm not alone — technology seals many Americans off from the world outside. According to a Gallup poll released in July, 53 percent of Americans use the Internet on a regular basis. In addition, most e-mail users spend about seven to eight hours per week on the Internet.

The Internet isn't the only thing that eats our time and keeps us inside. The Center for Media Education reports that, by age 70, most people will have spent 10 years of their lives watching television.

Where do we get our entertainment? It comes in boxes, decorated with a lovely pop culture motif. Our CDs, videos, Web sites and TV shows all are neatly packaged and ready for consumption.

Americans have become lazy and all too easily entertained. We don't take risks, except on Wall Street. We stay well within our comfort zones. Most adults spend more time in their cars, homes and offices than they do outside.

Technology is not a troll sitting under some bridge and trying to lure in unsuspecting passers by. Quite often, we set up our own technological prisons. We have so much to do that we often feel we don't have time to get outside and enjoy nature.

When we devote all of our time to work and electronic entertainment, we overlook the simple pleasures in life. We focus instead on electronic stimuli which bombards us from every side and kills our connection with nature.

I'm just as prone to this as the next person. Sometimes I feel like I'm trapped in the exact opposite of a sensory deprivation chamber. I'm so overstimulated with news, blaring music and information that I can hardly tell which way is up.

So what should we do about it? Turn off your computer, TV and stereo. Read a book outside. Take a hike. Enjoy the wildflowers out by the lake. Watch the sunset. Go outside and look at the stars.

The possibilities are endless. Don't get me wrong. I'm not suggesting that we all become Luddites and shun technology. I'm not saying, "Amen, brother Ted!" to the Unabomber.

Electronic devices and controlled climates can be good and helpful, but they become bad when we let them dominate our lives and our minds.

Take your life back. You don't have to miss out on the beauty of the natural world.

Oh, look at the time! Excuse me, I've got to go watch "The Simpsons."

LOCAL TALENT

WHO Dead Lemon

Dead Lemon is a nine-month-old punk rock band featuring drummer Chris Sleeker, freshman in engineering, guitarist/vocalist Shane Bishop and bassist Josh Schultz.

Sleeker said the band is always energetic, and sometimes the energy is more prominent than the talent. The band has fun performing, Sleeker said, and crowd response has been very positive.

Dead Lemon performs covers of songs as well as original songs, and the band integrates originals as they are written, Sleeker said. Their song, "Something," can be found on www.mp3.com/deadlemon.

Originally a guitarist, Sleeker said he started playing the drums two days before the band's first rehearsal and has been putting time into learning ever since. Sleeker said his father was a drummer, and he said he seems to have a knack for percussion. While he enjoyed guitar, Sleeker said the drums suit him even more.

Above all, the performance is the greatest part of being in a band, Sleeker said.

"I like the adulation of the crowd," he said. "Anytime we get a cheer, particularly if it's for one of our own songs, it's a rush."

If you have a suggestion for an interesting person to profile in brief, contact the arts and entertainment editor at arts@pub.ksu.edu.

Johnson shows his taste in music by sewing and safety pinning patches to his backpack.

Pyramid studs are fastened to the bag with bullet studs on the straps.

This Japanese character was cut from a T-shirt and Johnson said it means creative chaos.

This "Stop the Violence" patch was cut from an old T-shirt before becoming part of the bag's decor.

Minor Threat was a punk rock band in the 1980s. Johnson said his backpack shows his taste for punk music and his straight-edge affiliation.

Matt Johnson, junior in radio and TV, has decorated his backpacks since he was in high school. Here is a rundown on the various ways he has modified his current book bag. Photo illustration by JJ Duncan and Nicole Donnert/Collegian

Student backpack styles provide insight into personal interests

BY JJ DUNCAN
Kansas State Collegian

Individuality comes in many forms. Some people dress a certain way, some wear a distinctive hairstyle, and others wear their personalities on their backs.

Buttons, patches, keychains and bracelets are just some of the accessories adorning backpacks around campus. Enhancing the look of a backpack isn't the only reason to decorate backpacks, Matt Johnson, junior in radio and TV, said.

"It's self-expression. It shows what I'm all about," he said. "The patches, like the straight-edge, hard-core and ska ones, let people know who I am."

Johnson's backpack is three years old, and he said he began to decorate his backpack while he was in high school. He said that at first, he just wanted show support for the music he liked.

The various decorations show that he is Christian, straight-edge and against hatred and racism. Other adornments show bands he listens to, like Black Flag. Some of the patches are safety-pinned on, and some decorations are drawn on with white-out, he said.

"People ask to look at what's on there," he said. "When I go to get something out of it, sometimes I notice people's eyes are drawn to it."

Bruce Braden, junior in psychology, also puts patches from punk bands on his backpack. Braden said he began to modify his bookbags early in high school, and he likes it because it's something different than from all of the plain, everyday backpacks.

"People show their personalities in lots of ways, and this is just one way to do it," he said.

Instead of bands, the patches on Jay Banks' backpack show the different places he's been with the bag. Banks, junior in English education, said the patches on the bag are from all of the countries he has visited. The bag has been with him through all of the trips.

Some of the patches on Banks' bag include Spain, Portugal, Italy and New Zealand. During summer 2000, Banks backpacked through western Europe with his brother for three months, he said.

"I'm not trying to show off or anything," he said. "They're memories for me. Each little flag is. I put most of them on as I got to the country."

Ethany Nelson, junior in biology and pre-medicine, also shows the places she's visited with patches on her backpack. Westminster Abbey and Paris are just two of the places represented on

Nicole Donnert/Collegian
Matt Johnson, junior in radio and TV, dons his customized backpack. Johnson said it allows people to view aspects of his personality.

Nelson's bag.

Nelson said she likes the way decorations individualize people's backpacks.

"Mine shows the places I've been and some of the things I've done," she said. "Some of my more artsy friends painted theirs. It shows their creativity."

April Cordry-Moore, senior in math and education, said each of the decorations on her backpack represent something in her life. One accessory is a toy mouse head called Chip the Mouse that has information about computers in it. Cordry-Moore said she and her husband participate in Big Brothers and Big Sisters of Manhattan Inc. and Chip was given to her by her honorary little sister.

The Snoopy on her backpack originally had a utilitarian purpose.

"Snoopy is actually a clock," she said. "It doesn't work now, but in theory it's supposed to help me keep track of the time. I just like 'Peanuts' anyway."

Instead of patches or buttons, Sarah Bode, sophomore in theater, keeps a collection of friendship bracelets on her backpack.

Bode said she was a girl scout camp counselor over the summer and all of the bracelets were made for her by campers.

She had to carry the backpack around for the purpose of keeping a first aid kit with her, and the bag was a more convenient place to keep the bracelets than on her wrists, Bode said.

"I didn't like wearing them on my wrists, so I put them on my backpack so the girls could see I cared about the things they gave me."

How do they match up?

Match the correct backpack to its owner.

LOST OPPORTUNITIES

Huskers throttle Wildcats in three games, remain unbeaten in Big 12 competition

BY SEAN PURCELL
Kansas State Collegian

During the first two games of K-State's match against Nebraska on Monday night, several opportunities were lost that could have turned the tide for the Wildcats.

In the end, however, it was all Huskers.

"We were in it," head coach Suzie Fritz said. "We played good volleyball for two games of that match."

The No. 25 Wildcats (7-4, 3-2) fell to No. 2 Nebraska (11-1, 4-0) 30-28, 30-27, 30-20 in front of a crowd of 3,612 at Ahearn Field House. Senior Liz Wegner said the team gave away a lot of points.

"We made errors, and they didn't," she said. "That was the difference."

Wegner led the Cats with 18 kills and 11 digs. Senior Lisa Mimick and junior Jennifer Pollard also had 11 kills apiece, but in the end, it was unforced errors that led to K-State's downfall.

"Nebraska knew to give us the ball if they didn't have anything," freshman Gabby Guerre said. "We were looking for things that weren't there sometimes."

Games one and two in the match were back and forth battles which the Huskers ultimately won with late scoring runs. However, Fritz said those games proved the team could play anyone.

"We showed we can play with a top team in the nation," she said. "Unfortunately, we couldn't play for 30 straight points."

Fritz said it was frustrating to see the team fail to close the game after being up five points in the first set.

"Emotionally, it is very tough," she said. "Little plays and details and we would have been playing longer."

In the third game of the match, with their backs against the wall, the Cats came out of the break flat, Wegner said.

"We left our hearts in the locker room," she said. "We weren't ready to fight for it."

Freshman Gabby Guerre's spike is blocked during the first game Monday night against Nebraska. The Huskers' height was too much for the Cats, who now are 7-4 on the season and 3-2 in the Big 12.

Apparently, the Huskers were ready.

Nebraska broke out with a six-point scoring run midway through the final game, ending the Cats' hopes for a comeback.

"We got stuck in a rotation, and they rolled off points," Fritz said.

"That was a big shift in momentum."

Fritz said Nebraska played a cleaner style of game toward the end, not allowing K-State to key on Husker mistakes.

"Later in the match, they gave us

A good, tall brick wall tends to be a good defense in volleyball. Against Nebraska, K-State learned just how good.

As the Cats lined up against the Huskers on Monday, even 6-foot-4 middle blocker Jayne Christen noticed how big Nebraska looked.

"They average probably about 6-foot-2 inches plus, which makes it about the biggest block we've seen so far," Christen said, "and since we're not as tall as Nebraska, we don't have that to practice against."

Practice against that tall left block would have done K-State some good. The Huskers had an answer, in the form of six 6-foot starters, to every K-State attack.

"It's tough to get into rhythm when it's coming back at you all the time," head coach Suzie Fritz said afterwards. "I think it's the biggest block in the country."

Nebraska, which came into the night averaging 4.03 blocks per game, rejected 16 Wildcat kill attempts, enough to frustrate K-State's attackers for much of the match.

"I think we kind of got up tight and didn't really play our ball," senior outside hitter Liz Wegner said. "We played more scared instead of confident — that'll kill you."

Wegner registered 18 kills on the night to lead all hitters, but just four in the first game against a tough Husker line that arrived at just the right moment during most of the Wildcats' offensive opportunities.

Nebraska's blocking game improved throughout the match, too, tallying four blocks in the first game and six in the final two — an improvement that made a big difference in K-State's offensive plans.

"We got rattled a little bit toward the end," freshman Gabby Guerre said. "We were looking for a bunch of shots, and we should have just gave them the ball and kept the rally going."

K-State did a good job early in the match of recovering and converting on extra opportunities. However, as the night wore on, even that element of the Cat attack was kept in check by the Husker defense.

"I thought we did an okay job of covering our attackers and getting second, third, fourth opportunities for two games," Fritz said. "Later in the match, we were getting those opportunities, but we weren't taking advantage of them — we were knocking a lot of balls out of bounds instead of making them run after it."

Instead, it seemed like K-State spent much of the match trying to make a run. Christen said the Cats will have to get better at recovering from blocks and staying in system in order to come up with some big wins later in the Big 12 season.

"We know teams are going to get blocks, and we have to be ready to cover that," Christen said. "At times, we did a great job of covering, and at times, we let a few things fall."

Nebraska middle blocker Amber Holmquist, who stands 6 feet 4 inches, and setter Greichaly Cepero, 6-foot-2-inch junior, created problems up front for K-State during the Huskers' 3-0 sweep of the Wildcats at Ahearn Field House on Monday.

Zach Long/Collegian

Sooner's strategy to run down clock poor choice, does nothing to prove team's abilities to others

I am a loser. I really am. Not only that, I am a sore loser.

Like when I get punched in the head at a party, I whine and blame it on the beer, not the fact that I fight like a one-armed lemur. But, I just bought "Abs of Steel" and some Tae-Bi videos, (not porn), so things are looking up.

Now, let's focus on more immediate and important things.

Despite Saturday's game against Oklahoma being very competitive and both teams making a hell of an effort, I can't help but piss and moan about how the Sooners deliberately ran the clock at the end of the game.

Objectively, it might have been the proper strategy for Oklahoma to defend its end zone and ensure victory, but it's just so weak.

It doesn't reflect a team's skill or prowess on the field when this approach is utilized — it merely shows the coach's and the team's ability to manipulate the constraints of the game to their advantage.

You know what I call that? Legal cheating.

Now, Saturday's game might be a bad example because everyone played very well, and for the most part, OU earned the game ball, but it simply reminds me that it happens all the time.

Not only is the team or player who uses this underhanded method hitting their opponent below the belt, but I feel they're mocking them as well.

my view
Joe Elkinton

While they're at it, why don't they just stick the ball in the other guy's nose and prance around on their tiptoes like spoiled children, maniacally chanting, "You're not gonna win, nah nah nah nah nah?"

Many times, when the score is lopsided, and there is logically no way for the opponent to win, running the clock is just a way to maintain dignity and calories.

However, when the game is close and a turnaround is within sight, I say don't play like a little brat.

Obviously, as anyone with three brain cells can tell you, this course of action is not at all limited to football.

Everyone has watched an arrogant basketball player (likely one of those bastard Lakers) stand just within the half court mark, dribbling the ball with that stupid grin on his face as the last precious seconds slowly dwindle.

Surely he's just biding his time while he looks for an opening in the defense. No, no, wait, he stops, retreats a few steps and keeps dribbling, nearly pointing and laughing at the other team as the horn blows and the roof is raised.

I ask you, does that prove you're a great athlete or just a eunuch in Air Jordans?

I propose that anyone caught extensively dribbling the ball to run the clock has to do so using only his forehead, or the opponents are allowed to kick him in the junk. Whatever it takes to force athletes to play like men.

Even in God's favorite sport, hockey, this dastardly scheme arises, as much as I hate to admit it.

Players with weird, French names will just pass the puck around, as the other team is forced to send their goalie away from the net to battle the guys who don't have the shishkas to play fair.

Really, it's like what boys do to their little brother when they don't want him to play — "You can't get the ball, you can't get the ball."

Only in sports, the loser doesn't run away, crying for mommy, while the winner gets sent to bed without dessert.

I didn't see any Wildcats running with their tails between their legs Saturday after the game. What I did see, however, was a cowardly way to win for a usually uncowardly Sooner squad.

The point is that running the clock as the only method to win only proves that you have nothing else up your sleeve, so you sucker-punch.

My socks don't match.

SPORTS IN BRIEF

By Dan Smith

Invitational provides chance for tennis team to improve

The Wildcats took two of seven singles matches and one of three doubles matches against the University of Miami at the Georgia Bulldog Fall Invitational on Friday.

Freshman Maria Rosenberg swept the No. 3 singles slot with two 6-3 wins over Miami's Sihem Bennacer after No. 1 Alena Jecminkova and No. 2 Petra Sedlmajerova fell earlier. It was Rosenberg's first tournament of her collegiate career.

The Wildcats' only other singles win came from No. 6 Hayley McIver. The sophomore went three sets to win 6-3, 2-6, 6-4, over Jessica Peltó of Miami.

K-State's lone win in doubles play came from senior Kathy Chuda and junior Petra Sedlmajerova, taking the No. 2 match, 8-4, over Miami's Bennacer and Sara Robbins.

Mortimer leads Cats again, women's team takes fourth,

Junior Amy Mortimer earned her second win of the 2001 season as the K-State cross country team returned to action for the first time after a three-week layoff Saturday at the Oklahoma State Cowboy Jamboree in Stillwater, Okla.

Overall, the Wildcat women finished fourth out of 14 teams, with a total of 110 points on the 5,000-meter course, led by Mortimer's 17:20 time.

Amanda Crouse-Behnke finished second for the Wildcats and 12th overall with a time of 18:04.

K-State's men finished ninth overall among 17 teams with a total of 267 points. Senior Shadrack Kimeli finished first for the Wildcats and fifth overall with a 24:17 time.

K-State will see action again Wednesday at the Kansas State Harrier Relays in Topeka against UMKC.

Women's soccer team falls to Jayhawks; men lose early

Both of K-State's club soccer teams were in action last weekend at the Ed Chartrand Memorial Soccer Tournament at Frank Anneberg Park.

The women's team cruised through first-round and semifinal play to set up a rematch against Kansas in the final but fell 4-1 to the Jayhawks on Sunday night.

The Cat men failed to make it to the semifinal round after first-round competition.

Kansas also took the men's division with a 3-0 win over Southern Illinois.

Fair offers glimpse at KSU majors, minors

BY JOEY BOSE
Kansas State Collegian

Majors and career choices will be the focus of the Academic Majors Fair today.

The fair, which runs from noon to 4 today in the Grand Ballroom of the K-State Student Union, will provide information about majors and their effect on career choices.

Open to all K-State students, the fair provides easy access to representatives from all the university's colleges, including representatives from specific majors, secondary majors and minors.

"The fair is not a solution to a student's career concerns. Instead, it is a piece of the jigsaw," said Nancy Kiefer, event co-chair and adviser in the College of Arts and Sciences.

Students looking for a major or thinking about a change in academic focus are encouraged to attend, she said.

Also, up for exploration are the possibilities of having a secondary major or a minor.

"One of the advantages of having a major or a secondary minor is that it makes you more marketable," said Tinsley Furry, event co-chair and coordinator of the Academic and Career Information Center.

For example, Furry said, if a student is interested in international business, he or she could

How to be prepared

Come to the fair prepared with questions about a specific curriculum or what types of jobs a particular major might include.

Questions to ask at academic tables:

- What are the required courses for this major, minor, secondary major?
- Are there departmental/professional affiliations a student should join once he or she chooses a program?
- What jobs do K-State graduates obtain with this degree?
- Will a bachelor's degree in this major prepare me for a job in this field, or will I need to pursue graduate work?
- What are some advantages of having a dual major, minor or secondary major?

consider a minor in a foreign language.

Students thinking about switching their majors will find enough advice to aid their decision as well.

Poor grades are one sign that a student might be in the wrong major.

"Another sign is if you're having trouble getting excited about your classes," Kiefer said. "A common complaint I hear from students is that the major they chose is just not what they thought it would be."

said Monday. The frozen accounts include 30 in this country and 20 overseas, he said.

Showing the magnitude of the investigation so far, the Justice Department said it has analyzed 241 threats deemed serious and credible. Over 4,400 subpoenas were issued, and more than 500 people have been arrested or detained, including 145 people held on immigration violations.

At the same time, events moved quickly in Europe and the Middle East.

—Anti-terrorism judges in Paris questioned a man in connection with a suspected plot to attack the U.S. Embassy there.

—Four people suspected of links to global terrorism were arrested in Bosnia over the past few days, including two who were found with box cutters near Sarajevo's airport, authorities said.

—Jordanian authorities arrested about a half-dozen people in a second sweep since the terror attacks. The detained included Issam Barqawi, a Jordanian of Palestinian descent who was acquitted of conspiracy charges to carry out attacks against U.S. and Israeli targets during New Year's 2000 celebrations in Jordan.

—German authorities said the nation's intelligence had picked up phone calls by celebrating followers of Osama bin Laden, providing a link in the international investigation of the Sept. 11 attacks. But authorities acknowledged they were unable to pin down earlier contacts by bin Laden operatives to Muslims in Germany.

While unrelated to the recent attacks, a man who has been jailed in Pakistan since the 1986 hijacking of a Pan American World Airways flight has been arrested by U.S. authorities and is being returned to face hijacking charges.

Attorney General John Ashcroft said Zayd Hassan Abd Al-Latif Masud Al Safarini was arrested by American authorities Friday after he was released in Pakistan.

"This arrest demonstrates the commitment of the U.S. to track down persons charged with having committed terrorist acts against Americans, no matter how long it takes," Ashcroft said.

The money trail in the United States has led to Punta Gorda, Fla., where the owner of a mail service business said hijacker Atta and another person bought $100-to-$200 money orders at her store between four and six times from mid-July to mid-August.

Jean Waldorf, owner of The Shipping Post, said she did not know how the money was spent.

"He was not a friendly person," she said of Atta. "There was no 'please,' 'Thank you' or 'Have a nice day.' The main reason I recognized him was his eyes. When he looked at you, it was as if he was looking straight through you, very cold, no emotions."

The man questioned in Paris was Djamel Beghal, a French-Algerian, who was extradited Sunday from the United Arab Emirates in connection with an alleged plot to attack U.S. interests in Europe. Beghal was placed under formal investigation, a step short of being charged. French police have linked him to bin Laden.

Beghal, 35, was the second person extradited to France in connection with the alleged plot on the Paris embassy and other U.S. targets in Europe.

The students transferred from San Diego to New York were Osama Awadallah, Mohdar Abdullah and Yazeed Al-Salmi. They are to appear before a federal magistrate today.

The name and phone number of at least one of the students was found in a Toyota Corolla registered to suspected hijacker Nawas Alhazmi, according to published reports.

In Alexandria, Va., a federal magistrate ordered two Virginia residents detained without bond pending hearings on Wednesday.

effort to make the transition smooth. "The Taco Bell and Burger King staff are telling customers that sacks are available at the cashier stands," he said.

Braun said progressive changes are taking place to ensure that theft no longer will take place in the Food Court.

"Today is the first day," he said. "If anything needs to be done differently, or if signs need to be put up, we will. We are willing to do anything possible to make it easy for everyone concerned."

The results of the changes will be checked in a month.

"I trust that students will do the right thing," Kimble said.

fewer and fewer points," she said. "They kept serving well and won the attack and blocking aspects of this match."

K-State will rest today and then prepare for the University of Kansas on Wednesday after a loss that Wegner described as difficult to swallow.

"It's always rough losing," she said. "There is a lot of season left and we just have to keep preparing well for each game."

Guerre said the team can learn a lot from this loss and try to improve as the season progresses.

"Collectively, we need to work on staying in system and get better at ball control," she said.

Fritz said the positives and negatives the team will take from their match with the Huskers will help it throughout the rest of Big 12 play.

"Nebraska is always a good match for us," she said. "We'll have to regroup from this emotional loss."

Rumsfeld sends troops to former Soviet republics

BY RON FOURNIER
The Associated Press

WASHINGTON, D.C. — President Bush sent Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld on a four-nation mission Tuesday that could be a prelude to military strikes against terrorists. Bush warned Afghanistan's ruling Taliban there will be a consequence if they fail to surrender Osama bin Laden and his followers.

Rumsfeld left Tuesday night for military talks with leaders in Saudi Arabia, Oman, Egypt and Uzbekistan, key members of Bush's growing coalition. Uzbekistan borders Afghanistan, where terrorist suspect bin Laden is being sheltered by the Taliban government. Rumsfeld's first scheduled stop was Riyadh, the Saudi capital.

Before leaving, Rumsfeld ordered 1,000 troops from the Army's 10th Mountain Division at Fort Drum, N.Y., to the former Soviet republics of Uzbekistan and Tajikistan, both of which border Afghanistan, The Washington Post reported. Pentagon officials refused to discuss the report.

Building a case for war, U.S. diplomats shared confidential evidence with allies linking bin Laden's al-Qaida network to the Sept. 11 attacks and other terrorists acts. America's 18 NATO partners said the information was conclusive and formally declared the attacks on New York and Washington an assault against the alliance.

Bush sought to shore up his support in the Arab world, saying for the first time that the idea of a Palestinian state is part of the Middle East peace process. British Prime Minister Tony Blair, in step with Bush, planned a trip to Pakistan to solidify the U.S.-led campaign against the Taliban.

But first, the prime minister issued a threat to the hard-line Taliban.

"Surrender the terrorists or surrender power," Blair said during a Brighton, England, address to his Labor Party.

Rounding out a day that underscored Bush's broad campaign against terrorism, the Pentagon added more than 2,000 reservists to its gathering war effort.

AMERICAN TRAGEDY

BY NANCY HULL
Kansas State Collegian

The sound of bombs hitting nearby houses awoke Mohammad Iqbal night after night.

Iqbal, who grew up in an Afghanistan village, was in grade school when the Soviet Union invaded the country in 1979. And by the time he was 18, he'd dealt with the death of his father, the deaths of 40 some people in his 60-house village and witnessed a tank run over three people.

"People just became used to war. It just was very normal," said Iqbal, now a Manhattan resident.

"On a normal day, you were lucky to be with friends and family for an hour or two without hearing a bomb or explosion going off," he said.

He had no schooling past fifth grade — schools were bombed, and many teachers were killed. So during the days, he and his friends played a game similar to baseball.

AMERICAN TRAGEDY

This is the third in a series of stories aimed to educate the K-State community about Middle Eastern affairs. Look for it every Wednesday and Friday.

Firefighters battle a blaze that was started by a spark from a skid loader Tuesday night at the K-State Dairy Barn north of Marlatt Avenue. The barn, erected in 1933, contained more than 600 tons of hay and was destroyed in the fire.

Mike Shepherd/Collegian

down, the bails will smolder, but will burn until the fire eventually goes out.

At least one firefighter crew will have to be on site at all times, he said.

"I have heard of these kinds of fires, but I have never seen anything this big," he said.

"Those flames are about 20 feet high."

His first concern, he said, is the livestock.

"I have no cotton seed left to feed them," he said. "I have someone in the morning delivering a load of hay, but I don't know what to do after that."

He said hay season is over, and he will have to purchase more hay at high prices. The cows and heifers eat about five bails of hay each day.

"We were doing really good there for a while," he said. "This is going to be a huge setback."

Burning more than 600 tons of hay, flames blazed Tuesday night, destroying the K-State Dairy Barn north of Marlatt Avenue.

"An employee was moving hay with a skid loader, and a spark ignited the hay," Ronnie Grice, K-State director of public safety, said. "There were no livestock injuries, but the hay barn is a total loss."

The barn was erected in 1933.

The accidental fire was called in at 7:23 p.m., said Grice. By the time K-State Police had arrived, $5,000 in cotton seed, 200 bails of straw and one skid steer were lost in the fire.

Only one bail of hay remained. Livestock are kept approximately 50 feet away from the hay barn and were safe from the flames.

Grice said he would not release the total value of the loss until today.

The fire should continue to burn for two to three more days, Mike Scheffel, K-State Dairy Barn manager, said. Hay is packed tightly and compacted to prevent water from reaching the core of the hay, he said.

Aggieville, campus activities add to charm of city entertainment

BY MICHAEL WATSON
Kansas State Collegian

Turning to the Manhattan community and the K-State campus for entertainment, students can find many things to do on the weekends rather than hitting the bars.

Kyle Barker, student body president, said Manhattan offers a growing variety of entertainment venues.

Barker said students already have seen improvements with the Cat Track Go Karts and Fun Center, Wildcat Creek, Frank Anneberg Park and Colbert Hills.

"Manhattan tries to accommodate students' wants and needs," Barker said.

In Aggieville, people can eat at one of the numerous restaurants, play pool, darts or foosball, work out at one of the two fitness centers, rent a movie, buy sporting goods or visit one of the bars.

"Aggieville is, and will always be, the place for students to go for entertainment to relax and hang out," Barker said.

"But I think you can start to see more entertainment on campus in the coming years."

Part of the entertainment scene on campus includes events organized by the Union Program Council. Providing sneak previews for movies is one of the many events UPC sponsors.

Students cannot always afford to go to other places for entertainment, said Megan Hughes, junior in public relations and arts and Entertainment Committee chair.

She said the UPC wants to get more people involved on campus.

"Each week there is something going on every night. UPC has jazz nights, comedy nights, festivals, speakers and movies," she said.

"All of these shows, with the exception of the movies, are free," Hughes said.

"This is a college town, and college students don't have much money. We're providing alternative entertainment to other venues."

Football is a big source of entertainment in Manhattan. Cheryl Sieben, director of the Aggieville Business Association, said there is face painting at Varney's Book Store and a dunk tank in Triangle Park every gameday.

Rusty's Last Chance Restaurant and Saloon will sponsor Dustin Evans, a band that has performed at Country Stampede. Sieben said the group has a large following in Manhattan. Dustin Evans will play Oct. 19, the Friday before the K-State football team plays Texas A&M.

Sieben said merchants pay for shuttle buses to take fans from Aggieville to KSU Stadium, which helps bring daytime crowds to Aggieville. Shuttles begin two hours before kickoff, and they run non-stop until people are back after the game.

The shuttles are available for alumni, the community and students.

"A lot of alumni ride the buses," Sieben said.

"A lot of people come down to Aggieville for pregame to eat and whatever."

A lot of people spend time in Aggieville and get up to the stadium in time for the game."

Sieben said there has been quite a bit of interest in the empty spaces in Aggieville. There will be another dining establishment going in soon where Pyramid Pizza used to be.

Mayor Bruce Snead said he does not know if students feel there are enough places for dancing, live music or other venues.

"Students would probably say that more would be great," he said, "but we need to know that Manhattan can facilitate those needs."

STATE IN BRIEF

By The Associated Press

2 Kansas National Guard units called into local duty

TOPEKA — Two Kansas Air National Guard units have been activated as part of the military buildup authorized by President Bush, but it appears they will remain in the state for now.

About three dozen members of the 190th Air Refueling Wing's Security Forces Squadron at Forbes Field in Topeka were activated Monday. The orders could extend as long as two years.

Also activated was the 184th Security Forces Squadron, attached to the 184th Bomber Wing based at McConnell Air Force Base in Wichita. Guard spokeswoman Joy Moser said she didn't know how many members of the 184th were activated.

"At this point, they will be staying at McConnell," Moser said.

Capt. Karl Freundt said the 190th Security Forces members will be at Forbes as of now, and their primary duty will be protecting assets assigned to the 190th Air Refueling Wing, including its KC-135 tanker planes.

Wheat crop projections in state vary based on region

WICHITA — Winter wheat seeding is more than halfway finished around the state, with moisture conditions in many areas promising a good stand of the crop, the Kansas Agricultural Statistics Service said Monday.

That is a far cry from last fall, when farmers were planting dusty fields in a drought with little hope of bringing off a good crop.

But the service warned that some parts of the state, particularly in western districts, lacked enough soil moisture for a good crop.

This year, 55 percent of the wheat seed is in the ground — well ahead of last year, when just 23 percent had been planted as farmers delayed seeding to the last possible moment in hopes of getting some rain.

About 22 percent of the wheat crop already has emerged, compared to six percent last year, the service said.

State compiling list of price hiking gas stations

TOPEKA — State officials are compiling a list of gasoline station owners who have agreed to a settlement with Attorney General Carla Stovall over suspected price gouging.

The incidents occurred in the hours following the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks, in which some station owners raised the price of fuel to as high as $5 a gallon of regular unleaded.

Owners had until 5 p.m. Friday to respond to Stovall's settlement agreement or face prosecution.

Spokesman Mark Ohlmeier said about half the owners have responded.

"We're going to get it done," Ohlmeier said. "It's just taking us a little longer than what we expected."

Stovall's office suspects about 140 stations might have raised their prices following the attacks.

Owners who raised their prices to $2.49 or more per gallon of gasoline or diesel are subject to prosecution under the state's Consumer Protection Act.

NATION IN BRIEF

By The Associated Press

Federal Reserve cuts rates to spur economy, spending

WASHINGTON, D.C. — The Federal Reserve, faced with an economy that went from bad to worse after the terrorist attacks, cut a key interest rate Tuesday by a half-point, driving it down to a level not seen since 1962.

The Fed's rate cut, the ninth this year, is aimed at getting consumers and businesses — whose confidence has been badly shaken by the Sept. 11 attacks — to spend and invest, something that would keep the economy from becoming even weaker.

After a closed-door meeting, Federal Reserve Chairman Alan Greenspan and his colleagues announced they were cutting the target for the federal funds rates — the interest banks charge each other on overnight loans — to 2.50 percent, the lowest level since May 1962.

In response, commercial banks were expected to reduce their prime lending rates, the benchmark for millions of consumer and business loans, by a similar half-point to 5.50 percent, the lowest since Oct. 3, 1972, when the prime rate matched that level.

Workers continue search for fatalities in New York

NEW YORK — Clumps of bodies, including those of 15 firefighters, were found under the rubble of the World Trade Center.

The number of confirmed dead grew by 30 on Monday to 344, the largest increase since the first week after two hijacked jets smashed into the twin towers. Officials have identified 289 of the bodies, while 5,219 are listed as missing.

Professor appointed to position in community service

Deans

Tom Deans

assistant professor of English

Tom Deans, assistant professor of English, was named the first service learning faculty consultant to K-State's Community Service Program.

As a consultant, Deans will serve a one-year term as a Kansas faculty mentor and receive a $3,300 award to advise and assist higher education faculty statewide in implementing service learning.

Three other people in the state were named consultants also, so Deans said he probably won't have to do too much traveling.

"Since the others are in different parts of the state, I assume I'll work more closely with the northeast part of the state," he said.

He was selected through a two-tier application process. His prior service learning experience and peer elections aided in his selection.

"The community service office put out a call open to anyone in the state, and they select four statewide," Deans said. "They asked people essentially to apply and state credentials."

At a summer service learning institute, those present voted for their choices, which included Deans.

He will work during the school year to support faculty in incorporating service learning methodology into existing curriculum, provide professional support for recognizing and advancement of experiential educational efforts and provide leadership in establishing new service learning resource centers on campus for faculty and staff.

"We put together a coalition of nations that says terrorism won't stand," Bush said while announcing the reopening of Reagan National Airport outside Washington, the last airport still closed from the attacks three weeks ago. "We've got our military on alert for a reason: Terrorism won't stand. We're cutting off their money because we're saying, terrorism won't stand."

The White House welcomed Blair's forceful remarks — which went further, predicting an overthrow of the Taliban, than Bush himself has been willing to go. Senior White House officials, briefed in advance about Blair's address, said the president shared Blair's belief that the Taliban must bow to U.S. demands or surrender power.

"The prime minister was echoing exactly what I said" to Congress, Bush told reporters who accompanied him Tuesday night to a downtown restaurant, where he and first lady Laura Bush dined with Washington Mayor Anthony Williams.

The gasp was unanimous at the Strong Complex Date Auction on Tuesday night when the $259 bid was repeated by one of the two auctioneers.

One of the auctioneers, Deah Robinson, senior in social science, couldn't help stuttering as she confirmed it, which is the price one date with Joseph Thomas was auctioned for.

The bid for Thomas contributed to an overall Date Auction amount of $1,623, and was coordinated by Van Zile Hall following the attacks on New York and Washington, D.C.

The money raised from the auction will be donated to the American Red Cross and will help with relief efforts.

Thomas, junior in architectural engineering, said he normally wouldn't think a single date would be worth this price, but these are not normal circumstances.

"I think it's a great way for K-State to have an impact on what's happened in our nation," he said.

Smurthwaite Scholarship House purchased who bought the most 'dates' from the 33 residents who were put up for auction. By buying five people, Smurthwaite contributed $559.45 to the event. The three residents from the hall who were in attendance would bet against themselves to ensure that the total would reach its peak amount.

"We collected all of the money this afternoon," Sarah Odgers, vice president of Smurthwaite, said. "I think it was a great chance to help out resident halls, give back to our community and have a good time."

The second highest bid, $120, came from Keith Evestone, owner of Purple Pig, who bid on Jaime St. Louis, coordinator of the Date Auction.

"I came here because she asked me to help out with the relief, and I think it's great because this could be very embarrassing for the people being auctioned off, but they are stepping up and showing their patriotism," Evestone said. "I think they have gumption to step up there and contribute."

Carolyn Denney, freshman in open-option, and Shanda Walker, freshman in public relations, react to a bid at the Date Auction in Van Zile Hall, where they were auctioned off Tuesday night.

St. Louis said she was astonished by the $1,623 that was raised from the auction to help out the Red Cross.

"I'm shocked," St. Louis said. "I think it turned out awesome. I was impressed with everyone's participation and being able to pull out money from their pockets towards a good cause."

Entertainment in city present beyond 'Ville

On any given night, Aggieville is full of students drinking, conversing, dancing and eating. For many, Aggieville is the vein of entertainment in the community.

In his State of the University Address, President Jon Wefald outlined his vision for K-State. He communicated what he believed needed to be improved to make us a top 10 land-grant university. With our eyes turned toward the future, we have questioned what entertainment needs we might have in the future. Is Aggieville enough?

We contemplated and debated, and as we tried to think of things Manhattan might need to make it a more adventurous and exciting place, we realized we were at a loss.

Manhattan has a movie theater, plays, museums, parks, swimming pools, an ice skating rink, miniature golf course, programs from the Union Program Council, Colbert Hills Golf Course and many other entertaining attractions. There is more to entertainment in Manhattan than just Aggieville.

So if you find yourself mumbling to your friends that it is another night with nothing to do, open your eyes and take a look around. The city and the university do an excellent job of providing events for students, faculty, staff and city residents to attend. Our future entertainment needs sit in our own hands. Just take a pick at something you want to do.

Unwinding from within

Yoga classes chance for students to relax, concentrate

Soft music plays as a candle flickers. The candle is meant to be the center of focus. A place to direct our energies and just let go.

In a room filled with people at the Chester E. Peters Recreation Complex, there is a sense of individual intimacy.

It is almost as if the pieces of everyone's soul are being glued back together after a chaotic world has tried its hardest to rip it to shreds. I consider it my Sunday afternoon date with myself.

It is a time of connection. A time to concentrate on one's breathing. Just like a bar, the problems, tests and stress are left outside. This is the time for a peaceful intoxication of the soul.

Our instructor, Nicole Lang, junior in kinesiology, invites us to sit down and concentrate on our breathing. From there, we do different stretches, such as the child's pose and the camel pose.

Amanda Forsyth, graduate assistant in fitness and wellness, said some people perceive yoga to be too difficult for them, but it is not.

"A lot of people are really afraid these moves are going to be too complex," she said.

They are not. Everyone is encouraged to work at his or her own level, and Lang explains how to do the poses in a way that yoga beginners can understand.

Yoga was developed in India and has been evolving for the last 5,000 years.

The yoga class is offered from 4 to 4:50 p.m. Sundays at the Rec Complex. Starting tomorrow, it will be offered from 9:15 to 10:15 p.m. Thursdays. Lang said the class started off with 100 people, but now has around 150. She advises people to bring an extra shirt, pillow or towel to assist with certain poses.

Forsyth said requests have been made for a yoga class for some time now.

According to the Web site yogasite.com, the benefits for yoga are endless.

It has been proven to help with arthritis, asthma, back pain, depression, diabetes, headaches and stress. It helps improve flexibility and stamina, stimulates the immune system and helps create a sense of well-being.

Yoga also is beneficial for women who suffer from premenstrual stress. The above mentioned Web site offers positions for women to try to eliminate or at least reduce the feelings of anxiety, cravings, depression and the retention of water.

In the Sept. 30 issue of The Kansas City Star, there was an article about yoga.

Term limits restrict options for political leaders

Do you miss Bill Clinton? I do, too. Life just hasn't been as fun without him in office. Unfortunately, President Clinton wasn't allowed to be our president any longer.

Was it because he was voted out of office? Nope. Something much less democratic occurred. Namely, term limits.

Term limits are designed to prevent so-called "career politicians," or individuals who make a living serving in public office. Proponents of term limits argue that life long politicians are more susceptible to corruption and that changing representatives often benefits society.

Call me crazy, but I just don't buy into these arguments.

I think the people who argue for term limits are the same people who think every child who tries out for a high school varsity team should get equal time to play, no matter the ability level.

Let's say, for instance, that the NCAA instituted a new rule that said quarterbacks only are allowed to play one quarter. Would K-State still win most every game? Of course they would, because every team would be following the same rule.

However, wouldn't the level of play in college football as a whole be drastically reduced once the fourth string quarterbacks were in the game?

Term limits work the same way. We potentially get a lower quality of politicians by limiting the amount of time they can serve.

As for corruption, sure, there's a chance that a desire to stay in office might make an individual try to bend the rules. But won't that desire still exist for individuals not in their last terms? The only way to eradicate this problem completely would be to allow politicians to serve only one term.

So, does possibly reducing corruption by creating term limits outweigh the benefits of not having them? Well, let's take a look at those benefits.

Benefit No. 1: Term limits don't allow our best and brightest to stay in office. You don't have to look too far in history to see how this rule applies. Think of Franklin Roosevelt would have been limited to two terms. One of our best and brightest presidents would have been sitting on the sidelines instead of leading us in the beginning of World War II.

Benefit No. 2: Term limits take away voters' freedom of choice. It's not hard to imagine a scenario where people overwhelmingly want someone they trust to lead them for an extended period of time.

Just look at New York City. Rudolph Giuliani will not be allowed to continue serving as New York City's mayor after this year even though his approval rating right now is in the low 90s.

Why can't we just let the voters decide — always? If they don't like an incumbent, they'll vote him or her out. The voters always should have the choice to pick who they want.

Benefit No. 3: Term limits don't allow for experienced individuals to remain in office.

To use Mayor Giuliani again, wouldn't you want someone who's been mayor for the past eight years to guide you through this crisis, or would you rather have someone untested and new? I would imagine it would take some time to learn the ropes in running a city like New York. Doesn't it seem obvious that you want someone already familiar with the job to handle the current crisis?

easy to get wrapped up in our emotions, and we start to think we are those emotions.

Yoga is similar to spiritual cleansing of the soul. It is a chance to stop the self-abuse and replace it with a feeling of self-acceptance.

In the book, "Something More," Carol Horning wrote, "The body must be nourished physically, emotionally and spiritually. We're spiritually starved in this culture, not underfed, but undernourished."

This is the chance to take time for you. In an hour or less, you can change the way you feel about yourself.

You listen to everyone else, but when was the last time you truly listened to yourself?

You feed your body, but when was the last time you fed your soul?

Erin is a senior in print journalism. You can e-mail her at riveted4@yahoo.com.

This benefit also can be seen when we look at state legislatures that have imposed term limits. According to The Washington Post, there are 18 states that have enacted term limit legislation. Michigan and Arkansas have felt a major impact of those laws, with 50 percent turnover in their state legislatures. This means you have inexperienced, untested politicians trying to work with and put together complicated matters like state budgets.

I guess it all boils down to the fact that I'm not as cynical as most people when it comes to politicians. There are people who are capable of serving this country effectively, and they should be given every opportunity to do so. Why should we put a limit on their value to society?

I also think that change for the sake of change makes little sense. What if it were your job? If you were really good at your work and you enjoyed what you did, would you want the amount of time that you spent working there limited?

Students attend Majors Fair to learn about K-State's options of study

Students came prepared to ask questions and receive feedback on majors, minors and other academic programs Tuesday afternoon as they attended the Academic Majors Fair.

Nancy Kiefer, event co-chair and adviser for the College of Arts and Sciences, said she was excited as students arrived.

"I'm really hoping students take advantage of the opportunity to gather information about the academic programs on campus," Kiefer said. "We are very lucky that we have every college and many departments as well as university service organizations represented here today."

Students visited with different representatives throughout the day.

Angie Wagenblast, freshman in pre-health, said she came to the fair with an open mind. She said she wanted to learn about all the different majors K-State has to offer.

"I'm thinking about changing my major because I'm not set on pre-health," Wagenblast said.

Other students such as Bill Busenbark, freshman in sociology, came to get specific information on their academic interests. Busenbark said he came to check out the Department of History and the College of Education because he hasn't decided on a minor yet.

Tinsley Furry, event co-chair and coordinator of the Academic and Career Information Center, said about 1,000 students attended the fair.

"It went fantastic," Furry said.

This was the first year the fair has been in the fall. It usually takes place in February. Based on feedback from faculty and students, Furry said the fair now will be a fall event.

Faculty and students agreed that an event like this allows people to get to know each other while gathering information, Furry said. Most importantly, students get a chance to become goal-oriented and make decisions on their academic future.

Cats utilize team play, strong personal scores in victory

BY ERIKA SAUERWEIN
Kansas State Collegian

Sophomore A.J. Elgert said it seemed like forever since the K-State men's golf team placed first in a tournament.

Actually, it's only been since 1998, but the Wildcats broke that streak Tuesday by winning the Second Annual Jim Colbert Intercollegiate at the Colbert Hills Golf Course. The Wildcats posted a three-round total score of 902.

K-State was led by Elgert (73-71-79) and senior Matt Williams (76-71-76) who both placed sixth individually with a combined score of 223, seven over par.

"This is a big step for us," said Williams, who shot a team best 76 in the final round of the tournament. "This shows that we are consistent. We played well in Nebraska, and we played well today. This win shows us that if we play well, we can compete with anyone."

K-State was up six strokes to the University of Kansas after the second round. The Wildcats were able to hold onto the lead and beat out Lamar University by three strokes. No. 22 ranked KU took fifth in the tournament.

"I think there was a little pressure on us," Elgert said. "We had the lead, and really we are not familiar with being in that position. And Kansas is a great team, so we knew we had to play well today."

Although no Wildcat placed individually in the top five, head coach Tim Norris said he almost prefers it that way.

"I think that it is a good thing," he said. "This was an all-around team win. Everyone had some hits, and everyone had some misses. We showed a lot of patience as a team and didn't get flustered."

The teams in the tournament, however, had reasons to get impatient. They not only faced a strong wind throughout competition, but they also faced some tough holes.

"The course was extremely difficult today," Williams said. "It is a great course. But when you have a hard 20- or 30-mile-per-hour wind and some difficult pins, it is not a 72-par course anymore."

Norris said playing host to a tournament has its advantages and disadvantages.

"It is a double-edged sword," he said. "The pressure was on us this week. But we also have the advantage of knowing the course. It is windy here quite often, and the guys know not to worry about par but to play as best you can. The guys have played this course long enough to know to have patience."

Williams said the greatest accomplishment of the tournament was the solid scores from every Wildcat.

"The biggest thing was to see solid scores from five guys," he said. "We haven't had that in the past. Good solid play across the board is what we need."

Boucher leads Women's golf team to 10th place finish in Big 12 Tourney

afternoon. The Wildcats shot rounds of 319, 318 and 330 for the tournament.

Sophomore Christine Boucher, who was tied for fourth after Monday with rounds of 71 and 75, finished Tuesday's round with an 83, dropping her to 10th place to lead the Wildcats.

K-State's next action will be Oct. 14-16 in Lawrence, Kan., at the Marilyn Smith Sunflower Showdown.

Pair of sophomore men's golfers finding success in college play

BY ERIKA SAUERWEIN
Kansas State Collegian

As scary as it is, a K-State varsity athlete is a Nebraska Cornhusker fan.

And surprisingly, he still is alive to verify it. Sophomore A.J. Elgert is a member of the K-State golf team and although he is a Wildcat, the Nebraska native still is loyal to Cornhusker football.

"I never saw myself as a Wildcat," Elgert said. "I was looking at a lot of different schools, and K-State just jumped in there. I didn't see it happening. But in the long run, it has been the right choice."

Although Elgert stays true to NU football, he has no problem defeating the Cornhuskers on the golf course. Elgert, along with sophomore Aaron Watkins, assisted the Wildcats in placing third in the 11-team Fairway Club Invitational in Lincoln, Neb.

on Sept. 11.

Elgert placed third individually by shooting a 4-over-par 217 (76-68-73) which placed him in a four-way tie for third place. Watkins tied for 13th place individually with K-State senior Matt Williams. Watkins shot a 2-over-par 73 to tie Elgert for the team's low round of the day.

Although only sophomores, Elgert and Watkins said one year was all they needed to be comfortable in any varsity situation. Both of them have played at the No. 1 positions. Watkins participated in every tournament last year, and Elgert played in all but one.

"Last year, we didn't really know where we stood on the team, but now we know," Watkins said, "and we are confident."

Head coach Ted Norris said the two sophomores established a solid level at the end of last year, and their goal is to now keep improving.

"They have been around the block already," Norris said. "They have seen all the courses and have played a lot of competitive golf."

Norris said Elgert and Watkins are on the same golf level. Neither one of them shows weakness in his golf game. Norris said they both are very competitive players and driven athletes.

"A.J.'s confidence has improved," Norris said. "He knows if one part of his game is not good one day, other aspects will pick up. And Aaron is just waiting for his breakthrough round. He needs one low round and breakthrough to get up to A.J.'s scores."

Elgert and Watkins both said their mental games are what has improved the most from last season.

"I have learned temperament," Elgert said. "I am more accepting of bad shots, and I have learned that it is going to happen. It is just a matter of growing up and realizing you can't play your best every time."

But it looks as if Elgert and Watkins both want the best, not only of themselves, but also of the team. Watkins said K-State has plenty of potential this season. He said he sees the team easily qualifying for regionals and then hopefully reaching the NCAA Championships.

"I want our program to be in the top 20-25 in the nation," he said. "I want K-State golf to be nationally known, like our football team is. And the way things are going, I think it will happen."

Not only do the sophomores share similar golf abilities and common goals, but they also often share a room and a strong friendship. By being teammates and roommates on the road, Norris said a bond has been created between the sophomores.

"They are good friends," he said.

"Whoever you room with on the road is important. The roommate is there kind of for a shoulder to cry on, or is there to get you motivated or to kick you in the butt and get you going for the next round."

Elgert, Watkins and the rest of the Wildcats played in the Jim Colbert Invitational in Manhattan Monday and Tuesday. The tournament is K-State's only home match for the fall season.

"It is a big advantage to play at our home course," Watkins said. "We know the course and what different shots to take. Hopefully, we will come out with a victory."

Meanwhile, Elgert is slowly starting to accept K-State football. He said football arguments get a little heated every once in awhile on road trips, but his interest level has increased from last year.

"I have learned that I have to stay away from the Nebraska gear," he said.

K-State runners to race UMKC in unconventional meet

BY ADAM BUEHLER
Kansas State Collegian

When K-State's cross country team returns to action today, it will look to outrun the University of Missouri-Kansas City in the Kansas State Harrier Relays in Topeka.

Instead of a traditional race, the format of the Harrier Relays pairs athletes in two-person teams. One runner will run a mile loop around the course, and when he or she finishes, his or her teammate will run the same loop. Each woman on the squad will run three loops for a total of six miles per team. The men each will run four loops accounting for eight miles.

"It is kind of an unconventional race," head coach Randy Cole said, "but it gives us a chance to get in a competition and should be a lot of fun."

The Wildcats are coming off of an impressive showing at the Oklahoma State Jamboree, where the women finished fourth out of 14 teams and the men finished ninth out of 17 teams.

The Cats have played host to the Harrier Relays the past three seasons and traditionally have done well. The women have won the last two competitions, and the men have split the last two contests with the Kangaroos.

"It is good to get the team on a real cross country terrain for training purposes," Cole said, "and you can see a good competitive rivalry developing."

The women likely will look to senior captain Amanda Crouse-Behnke to set the tone for the team. Crouse-Behnke finished second for the Wildcats last week and 12th overall. Junior Amy Mortimer should provide a spark for the team as well, already having won two races this year. Mortimer's last win came just last week at Oklahoma State.

"Amy is running very solid, controlled races," Cole said. "She has really measured herself well against the other front runners in races."

"Last week she didn't even take the lead until the very end of the race. She just worked her way up, battled down the home stretch and outkicked the other girl."

Preparation, Mortimer said, is the key to her recent success.

"It's just going out there and taking care of business every day," Mortimer said. "I like going in prepared and then focusing on a plan of attack."

Cole said he feels confident the women will be competitive, both in today's race and for the rest of the fall season, citing the need to close the gaps between runners as his only worry.

Mortimer said she agreed with her coach's statement and said the team must take the season one race at a time.

"It is kind of our team slogan to just go out and take care of business," Mortimer said. "We will deal with the results as they come."

That might seem like a strange strategy for such a young team, possessing only one senior, but as inexperienced as the women's squad is, it hasn't hindered the team thus far.

"We have a lot of new faces this year," Crouse-Behnke said, "but we're really starting to come together as the younger girls get used to racing in this type of competition."

The men appear poised to compete today as well, although they most likely will be running without freshman Matthew Kimutai, their second-best finisher at OSU.

"Matt ran pretty well last week," Cole said. "If you consider that he was running on a very sore foot, his finish was impressive. Though due to the injury, we might rest him this week."

Senior Shadrack Kimeli finished fifth at the Oklahoma State Jamboree, followed by junior Derek George and senior captain Reid Christianson who finished 86th.

Amy Mortimer competes earlier this season in Augusta, Kan. Mortimer won the race last week at Oklahoma State.

Nathan Jackson, senior in theater, plays Miss Daisy's driver, Hoke. Miss Daisy is played by Pat Foltz, debate and forensics coach at Manhattan High School. They are part of a three-member cast that will perform the 1950s play "Driving Miss Daisy" this weekend.

Play utilizes three-person cast, poses various acting challenges to its actors

BY KATIE LANE
Kansas State Collegian

Taking on racism and a friendship that transcends social norms, "Driving Miss Daisy" will be presented by a three-person cast starting Thursday.

Pat Foltz, debate and forensics coach at Manhattan High School, is playing Miss Daisy. The play was written in the 1950s, but it is unique because of how timely it is now, Foltz said.

"The play is about racism, prejudice and bombings, which we are now facing in our country because of the Sept. 11 attacks," she said.

Foltz said that because of the tragedy, opening night was rescheduled.

The first performance was scheduled for Sept. 27, then it was changed to Thursday.

She said it was difficult to prepare because the cast members lost a week of rehearsal time and because of the issues that are being dealt with in the play.

Fred Nelson, who plays Miss Daisy's son, Boolie, said he agreed that the attacks have made it difficult to practice.

"Because of the attack on the World Trade Center, it has been hard to concentrate," said Nelson, physics teacher at Manhattan High School.

"We also have had to be there for our students."

Nathan Jackson, senior in theater, is playing Miss Daisy's driver, Hoke. Jackson said playing a character who is 40 years older than him sets this play apart from others he has portrayed. Acting alongside more experienced actors also makes this play different.

"You get worried about the mistakes you make and how they will react. At first, you don't know how they will take it," he said.

"You know because they have experience they will catch all of your mistakes."

Nelson said having only two other actors to deal with has made "Driving Miss Daisy" unique from any other play he has been in.

"You only have a small number of cast members to work with," he said.

"It is different to not have feedback from many other actors."

"Driving Miss Daisy" is a play that can appeal to all different age groups, Foltz said. She said the live experience is worth taking the trip to the theater.

"People should go to the theater," she said. "A live experience is much more emotional than a movie or a book."

Since many people have seen the movie, Jackson said he thinks people should go and see the play because they are taking a slightly different twist with the story.

Nelson said the play shows how people relate to one another, but he thinks the story alone is delightful and a good enough reason to see it.

"It is an entertaining story. People who come will laugh, smile and probably cry a little bit, too," Nelson said. "It is just plain, good entertainment."

After being postponed to observe a national day of mourning following the Sept. 11 attacks, the Opus Band competition has been rescheduled.

Originally slated to take place Sept. 14, the event now will be at 5 p.m. Friday.

The decision to reschedule the event was made early the morning it was scheduled to take place, said Megan Hughes, Union Program Council Arts and Entertainment Committee chair.

"They had just announced it would be a national day of mourning, so we decided it would be inappropriate to have a band competition that day," Hughes, junior in mass communications, said.

"With all the memorial services, we didn't think it would be right to have it that day."

Gina Kimble, UPC program adviser, said she supported the decision.

"We wanted students that were competing as well as audience members to be with their families if they chose to be rather than hold a big concert," she said.

The bands were contacted as soon as the decision was reached. Though the notice was short, Evan Weir, drummer for Brothers From Different Mothers, said the band was understanding of the Opus postponement.

"It was the appropriate thing to do," he said.

"It gave people some time to think about it, reflect and put it all in perspective."

No changes have been made to the competition, Hughes said. It will begin at 5 p.m., and the bands will be Orange, Nova Fade, Fixt, Key, Brothers From Different Mothers, Flybox and Sabbath Rest.

The first place winner will receive $400, and $250 will be given to second place, with $150 given to third place.

Hughes said she still is looking forward to seeing the performances.

"There are a lot of bands I've never heard, and I want to hear all the different music," she said.

The bands will be judged in five categories: originality and delivery of music, instrumental ability, vocal ability, stage presence and audience appeal.

Hughes said she's looking forward to the variety available at the competition, and the postponement will help the event.

"This way, there's no cloud hanging over the bands," she said. "We can do it without wondering if it's a good idea or not."

"The paved roads were destroyed, and the buildings at colleges were destroyed," he said.

At that time, Ebadi, like anyone with a U.S. background, feared the communist regime that gained power after war with the Soviets.

The house he lived in with his wife and children was searched several times in the middle of the night.

During one search, he remembers the communists finding his American textbooks. They suspected the books were provided by the U.S. to spread anti-communist propaganda.

"I said, 'These are engineering, science and math books.' I said, 'They are nothing,' Ebadi said. 'If they were not books with formulas, it would have been an excuse to take me off."

For fear of his life, Ebadi left for good in 1981. After an 18-month struggle, he was reunited with his wife and five children, who were as old as 10 and as young as a few months.

K-State physics research associate Ahlam Al-Rawi, who was raised in Baghdad, Iraq, hasn't been home for 15 years.

When she left in 1986 because her husband had a scholarship to the United States, the country was at war with Iran. Since the Persian Gulf War, she's heard of the country's struggles.

"I get letters that say 'You can only imagine what it's like,'" she said.

Since the Gulf War, an embargo enforced by the United Nations has dragged down the country's economy. When Al-Rawi left, the monetary exchange was $3.34 to one dinar, the Iraqi currency; now, she said, there's $1 to 1,500 dinar.

"We would always eat meat with our food. Now they cannot afford that, and they just eat vegetables," Al-Rawi said.

She said that when she sent her 6-year-old niece a Barbie doll, it was the greatest thing she had seen.

"She couldn't sleep because she would just lay in bed and hug the Barbie doll," said Al-Rawi, who had many dolls and toys as a child.

Her 10-year-old nephew sent her a picture of a lantern he drew on a piece of paper. Next to the lantern, he wrote "The Lantern: We cannot part it because we live by it these days in Iraq." The cities use electricity in a three-hour on, three-hour off rotation.

Yet Al-Rawi's family does better than others. "The poor ones sell their organs for money. Or they sell their door or window," she said.

Still, Al-Rawi wishes she could go home to visit, but she doesn't have a return visa to the U.S. She misses many things at home, including palm trees, Islamic arches and friendly people.

"When I'd leave for work in the morning, I'd see my neighbor and say, Good Morning," she said.

Despite the wars, she considers Iraq safer than America.

"There's not as much crime. I used to leave my kids outside alone late at night," Al-Rawi said.

The government pays for education and health care. And she said the treatment of women in Iraq is better than anywhere in the world. The prestigious jobs — teachers, doctors, engineers — are equal between men and women. Men who divorce their wives and leave children behind are rejected by society, she said.

"Everything is equal," she said.

Thoughts on America

Al-Rawi said many Iraqis question American decisions. The United States supported Kuwait during the Gulf War, and she remembers when a civilian shelter was bombed, killing thousands of people.

"There was a lady who lost seven children in that shelter. She turned the shelter into a museum," she said.

Abdullah Al-Shehri, who came to Manhattan more than three years ago, said Saudis wanted to be like Americans.

"It was good to eat pizza and a burger like Americans," Al-Shehri, graduate student in education, said. "Everyone wanted to come here to get educated."

Education in Saudi Arabia was more focused on memorizing instead of understanding, he said, and it wasn't possible to get a doctoral degree in every major.

Al-Shehri had some misconceptions about America.

"We'd always learned about America from the movies," he said. "American movies always had violence — not a quiet society," he said.

The Saudis supported the United States during the Gulf War, so there were no hard feelings. But the Afghans do have negative feelings about America.

Iqbal said Afghans loved Americans during the war with the Soviets. The United States supplied weapons to the Afghans.

But since 1998, opinions started to change.

"A lot of innocent people died then when the U.S. was trying to hit one of bin Laden's camps," Iqbal said.

But Ebadi said everyone needs to quit pointing the finger.

"If someone bombs civilians, it accomplished nothing," he said.

He said he hopes people everywhere will take a more global perspective.

"Here we get so occupied with what's going on — like sports," Ebadi said. "It's an interdependent world, especially now. Whatever happens here will have an impact on a country there, and whatever happens there will have an impact somewhere else."

Manhattan reaches agreement with Union Pacific on unpaid bills

BY MICHAEL WATSON
Kansas State Collegian

The Manhattan City Commission approved an agreement to pay the Union Pacific Rail Road for payments that have not been paid since 1987 during Tuesday's meeting.

The railroad said the city needed to pay the sum of $4,630 per year to continue usage of its land along the eastern edge of Tuttle Creek Boulevard, from Fremont to Kearney streets. They also said the city owed that sum for delinquent payments, totaling $56,680.

"We are somewhat at their mercy because they control the area. They can kick us off their right-of-way," City Manager Ron Fehr said.

The City Administration and UPRR agreed to a supplemental agreement for a one-time fee of $19,340 and $1,876 for past fees. The rate for past fees follows the same rate as the original agreement in 1972 of $134 per year.

Fehr said this payment entitles the city to use the right-of-way for as long as UPRR owns it. In the event that ownership ceases or terminates the city's use of the right-of-way within 10 years, UPRR will reimburse the city on a prorated basis.

"If the railroad spur goes away, the land will be redeveloped," Fehr said. "If that happens, the city could have the land dedicated and have the water main at no cost."

The City Commission also approved a Kansas Department of Transportation resolution for safety improvements to the intersection of North Manhattan and Kimball avenues.

The total project will cost $2,750,000. It includes turn lanes into Meadowlark Hills, grading, repaving and purchase of right-of-ways. The project is expected to be finished by November 2002.

Mayor Bruce Snead said this is going to affect traffic during the football season.

"My guess is that the university would be happy if it were done by Sept. 1," he said. "But that is next to impossible. It is really going to make football season hard, but it will take the whole construction season."

Fire continues; losses estimated

Matt Stamey/Collegian

While the K-State Dairy Barn is engulfed in flames, the only fire hydrant in the area supplies water to the fire fighters to help extinguish the blaze. The Riley County Fire Department were forced to bring in a 1,200 gallon tanker to assist with the water shortage.

A shortage of food to feed K-State's cows is now in effect due to a fire at the K-State Dairy Barn on Tuesday night.

Fire Services battles blaze following water shortage

BY ALYSON RALETZ

Faced with a 20-foot-high wall of flames, firefighters had to extinguish a hay barn fire Tuesday with a shortage of an essential resource — water.

"With the small number of fire hydrants in the area, it was like turning on a large garden hose and only getting a trickle of water to come out," said Chuck Tannehill, Manhattan Fire Services operations chief.

The K-State Dairy Barn, north of Marlatt Avenue, caught fire Tuesday evening after a spark from a steer loader ignited 600 tons of hay. It still is burning. The damages to the hay barn, built in the 1970s, reached $130,000, according to Fire Services.

Water mains get smaller toward the areas in Manhattan that previously were more rural, Tannehill said. Before these areas were developed, he said, it was more economical to run smaller water lines.

It took firefighters more than five hours to extinguish a bulk of the fire.

"We didn't have the overwhelming quantity of water we needed to diffuse a fire of that magnitude," Tannehill said. "There is a large amount of fuel concentrated in hay fires."

The Riley County Fire Department also brought in a 1,200 gallon tanker to assist with the shortage.

"We needed the trucks and the tankers pumping to get higher pressure," he said. "We spent all night manipulating hose lines and tackling heat pockets within the hay."

Initially, firefighters also had access problems on the narrow roads surrounding the barn.

"With the size of our trucks, we had a hard time maneuvering on the country roads," he said.

Despite the shortage, 26 firefighters battled the fire until 12:29 Wednesday morning, when the flames became manageable, he said.

A skeleton crew remained on-site all night and has been checking in periodically since Wednesday afternoon to keep the blazing and smoldering hay bales under control.

"It was a big fire where you saw lots of flame," he said. "But compared to the veterinary medicine complex fire earlier this year, it was relatively minor. Other than the economic value of the barn, no research or belongings were lost."

commodities shed, which holds the cotton seed, is built 100-200 yards away from the hay shed.

"I want to spread out the risk," he said. "The barn is not in the right spot if it were to ever catch fire again."

Once the fires diminish, student labor will focus on daily chores and the construction of the new barn.

"A lot of people are in limbo right now," he said. "Everyone wants something to do. They want to help, but right now there is nothing to do but take care of the cows."

Since the state only provides liability insurance to the barn, rebuilding it will require private donations, he said.

"We've had several hay donations already," he said. "It's a start. I'll take anything at this point."

Ron Strauss, a hay supplier from Junction City, delivered a load to the barn Wednesday morning. Strauss donated 10 tons to help the barn get back on its feet, he said.

He used to be a dairy farmer and also lost his hay barn to a fire this year.

"I know what they are going through," he said.

"There's an urgency right away to feed the cows and monitor their changed rations."

Whenever food rations change and the cows' consistent diet is disrupted, Scheffel said, there is a 10 percent milk production loss.

Until the new barn is built, the workers are storing whatever hay bales they can get under a tarp at the Dairy.

Plans to rebuild barn on hold until fire ceases; more hay needed

BY ALYSON RALETZ
Kansas State Collegian

Lacking a permanent location to store their cow feed, K-State Dairy workers are waiting for the smoldering hay bales to cease before they can rebuild the hay barn.

Student workers helped haul steel remnants of the barn away from the site Wednesday afternoon, Mike Scheffel, K-State Dairy Barn manager, said.

"As soon as it is leveled off, we can start building," Scheffel said. "We hope to get started within two to three weeks. It's hard because we still have to concentrate on getting the cows fed and other chores done while worrying about the fire."

He said he wants to design the new barn so the Studio provides second home for architecture students

BY KECIA N. SEYB
Kansas State Collegian

Ask architecture students where they live, and many will say, "studio," but one still might wonder what studio is and what these students do there all day and night.

"We just build models, and we draw," said Joel Richardson, fourth-year student in architecture. "It's a revision process. Research is very important."

Right now, the fourth-year architecture inhabitants of the studio in Seaton Court 106, where Steve Swartz said the best smoke space is, are working on a project that constitutes 40 percent of their grade.

"It's a weird project because we start out with art and then transcend. Cardboard is free — that's why we're using it," Swartz said.

Richardson said the project involves extensive research.

"It's a creativity exercise," Richardson said. "Some of us are using cardboard, chipboard — the idea of taking art and making it into something beautiful."

This studio's professor, Bob Condia, said the students will have to make an artistic presentation.

"We are studying the art in architecture," he said.

The project is due at 1 p.m. Monday, and Swartz said the studio horror stories start the week before a project is due. Any free moment is not free — it's spent in studio.

"We have no life outside of here. It's kind of sad when you think about it," Swartz said.

Since the people who share a studio spend so much time there, Swartz said people get to be really familiar with one another.

"It's like high school. You spend all your time here — you either love 'em or you hate 'em," Swartz said. "You just know everyone."

Studio counts as five credit hours, but the students have the class four hours a day, three times a week. Most of them also are taking 12 additional hours.

"It's a lot of work — a lot of work," Richardson said.

"You get used to it, though," Swartz said.

Condia spends the hours for studio each week with his class — the 12 people who practically live in Seaton Court 106, but outside of that, he said he wasn't quite sure what the students did.

"I don't want to know what they're doing," he said. "I want to assume they're working hard."

After the fourth year is finished this semester, they either will do internships or study abroad. Swartz will study in Australia, while Richardson will go to Italy.

Richardson, Swartz and Leah Hanke, who also is a fourth-year student in architecture, said some of their classmates once had a contest to see who could survive the longest with no sleep, but had to call it a draw. Hanke, however, said she can't go too long without her bed.

"I haven't stayed up more than a couple days," she said. "Your body just shuts down after awhile. There's nights when you'll just go home and sleep for three or four hours. But if you sleep for just an hour, that's not enough. You won't get up."

Hanke said that with the lack of sleep, sometimes work can become a little more difficult.

"You can think to a certain point," she said. "The lines might not be that straight."

Lack of sleep also leads to fun sometimes, Richardson said.

"The bad thing is when you're up so late, everything becomes funny," he said.

Most studio students, the three said, rely on some sort of caffeine or stimulant to keep them going. Richardson endures with coffee — lots of coffee.

U.S. sends aid money from fund to Afghans

BY BARRY SCHWEID
The Associated Press

WASHINGTON, D.C. — Secretary of State Colin Powell said Wednesday a prospective military strike in Afghanistan against the al-Qaida terrorism network only would be the first step in the U.S.

campaign against terrorism. At the same time, the Bush administration was preparing to substantially boost its humanitarian aid to Afghanistan.

President Bush was preparing to announce expanded humanitarian aid to Afghanistan in a visit to the State Department today, two administration officials said. The new money will approach $100 million, one aide said.

Over the weekend, Bush dipped into an emergency fund and authorized an additional $25 million in relief aid to Afghan refugees. This brought U.S. assistance to more than $205 million, including $32.8 million in assistance over the last few weeks.

Powell received unqualified support Wednesday from Qatar, a Persian Gulf emirate. "This is the first phase of this operation," Powell said. "I obviously cannot comment on what might happen in the future."

As Powell left open the possibility of taking the U.S. fight beyond Afghanistan, he offered assurances that "we are not looking for conflict with other nations."

On the diplomatic front, meanwhile, Richard Haass, director of policy planning for the State Department, made plans to meet in Rome today with Afghanistan's deposed former king, Mohammad Zaher Shah.

It was the highest-level U.S. contact with the ex-monarch. "We support the idea of a broad-based government in Afghanistan," department spokesman Richard Boucher said. "We are certainly interested in his ideas."

Haass is on a weeklong trip to Europe for talks with European government policy makers in France, Belgium, Rome and London.

School board votes to keep MHS mascot

BY SARAH RICE
Kansas State Collegian

The Manhattan-Ogden USD 383 Board of Education voted to retain Manhattan High School's Indian mascot with a vote of 4-3 after three hours of heated debate Wednesday evening.

Board member Walt Pesaresi said that although he voted to keep the mascot, actions still need to be taken to ensure that American Indian people are not offended.

"I strongly respect the rights of minorities," he said. "We need to work on some things dealing with the Indian mascot."

Board member Roger Brannan voted for retiring the mascot.

"It hurts to weigh this issue after teaching at MHS and feeling the effects of tradition," he said. "As much as I hate to change tradition, I will advocate for changing the mascot."

Dozens of citizens voiced their opinions on both sides of the issue. Craig Parker, professor of music history, said the mascot was not created to honor football coach Frank Prentup, as many people believe.

"Nowhere in any news account from that time period does it mention honoring Prentup," he said.

Parker said the high school newspaper staff of 1941 had to beg students for

Olathe state legislator not resigning after comments

TOPEKA — A female legislator whose comment that women's suffrage is a sign that American society doesn't value the family enough does not plan to resign.

Sen. Kay O'Connor also said Wednesday that her views about women's suffrage continue to be misrepresented. She issued a statement stressing that she votes and encourages other women to vote.

Last week, O'Connor, a Republican from Olathe, confirmed that she told leaders of the Johnson County League of Women's Voters that she did not view the enactment of the 19th Amendment to the U.S. Constitution, which allowed women to vote nationwide, as an event to celebrate.

She said women would not feel the need to vote if men took care of them properly and that women's suffrage was a sign that men weren't — and still aren't — doing their jobs. She said men should be the heads of households and women, the hearts.

Reno county encouraged by fewer Hepatitis A cases

HUTCHINSON — New cases of hepatitis A are waning in Reno County, but health officials aren't letting up in their efforts to stem the outbreak that began nearly a year ago.

As of last week, 80 cases had been confirmed since Nov. 1, 2000, the county Health Department said.

"We don't have any cases awaiting confirmation, and that's real good news," department director Judy Seltzer said. "It's too soon to say this means something, but it's an encouraging sign."

The outbreak began in November with two confirmed cases, followed by two in December. Rising numbers were confirmed in the following months: five cases in January, four in February, seven in March, nine in April, eight in May, eight in June, and the peak number — 14 cases — in July.

Since July, however, the numbers declined. There were 13 cases reported in August and eight in September.

Greyhound bus hijacking leaves 6 dead, 34 injured

MANCHESTER, Tenn. — A passenger on a Greyhound bus cut the driver's throat Wednesday, causing a crash that killed six of the 40 people aboard and prompted Greyhound to temporarily halt service nationwide. The driver told authorities the attacker used a box cutter.

The driver was treated for a cut to his neck and was stable after surgery, a hospital official said. The attacker, who had a Croatian passport, was killed, the FBI said.

"He just went up to the bus driver and, like, slit his throat, and the driver turned the wheel, and the bus tipped over," passenger Carly Rineerson told Nashville TV station WTVF by cell phone from the crash site.

The crash happened on Interstate 24 near Manchester, 50 miles south-east of Nashville.

The bus originated in Chicago with a final destination of Orlando, Fla., Greyhound spokesman Mike Lake said.

Six people died at the scene, and the 34 others on board were injured, said Dana Keeton, a Tennessee Department of Safety spokeswoman.

Earlier, U.S. Justice Department officials said they did not believe the attack was terrorist-related, but that the investigation was continuing.

Bush proposes economic package to avert recession

WASHINGTON, D.C. — President Bush and his top economic adviser urged Congress on Wednesday to approve a stimulus plan of between $60 billion and $75 billion to avert a steep recession triggered in part by last month's terrorist attacks. "I know people are hurting," Bush said.

Proposing tax cuts for individuals and businesses, Bush told business leaders in New York that Washington must "provide a kick start to give people reason to be confident, and we will do that."

Bush said the administration is considering tax rebates for people or accelerating the tax cuts approved earlier this year. For businesses, corporate tax cuts and investment tax credits are among the options. Laid-off workers need extra relief, he said, because the attacks "shocked our economy just like it shocked the conscience of our nation."

White House seeks delay in planned farm programs

WASHINGTON, D.C. — The White House on Wednesday urged lawmakers to delay work on an overhaul of farm programs, saying this is the wrong time to consider a large increase in spending on agricultural programs.

In a statement of administration policy, the Office of Management and Budget also said the $170 billion bill that the House started debating Wednesday would encourage continued overproduction of crops while failing to help the farmers who most need government assistance.

"In the context of the current state of the nation, consideration of large new financial commitments that do not require immediate action are not timely," the statement said, adding that the bill misses the opportunity to modernize farm programs.

Farm groups were hoping House approval this week would put pressure on the Senate to act quickly on a bill of its own.

Danesi Dokpesi

"Small town America has a lot of nice people."

Milling science program brings Nigerian to K-State

BY KECIA N. SEYB
Kansas State Collegian

Danesi Dokpesi, an international student from Nigeria, Africa, is attending the only university in the world with his major—K-State.

Dokpesi, freshman in milling science and management, said he found out about K-State by pure coincidence.

Dokpesi's father, who is general manager of a flour mill in Dokpesi's home city of Ibadan, happened to sit beside President Jon Weald's wife, Ruth Ann, on an airplane flight from Dallas to Kansas City, Mo.

"She told him about the program here, and it sounded very nice," Dokpesi said.

He has been here since last January. He said he thought it would be hard to get used to a small community after living in Ibadan, a city of 3 million people.

"Small town, America, has lots of nice people," he said. "I thought it'd be hard, but it hasn't because the people are so nice. They're all so friendly, so it hasn't been hard for me to fit in."

One difference Dokpesi said he has noticed between America and Nigeria is the spending culture.

"Back home, there's a large emphasis on saving," he said.

In the United States, he said, people spend much more freely.

"That's probably what drives the economy. Producers get more money," Dokpesi said.

Although K-State has intramural sports, Dokpesi said he misses soccer back home.

"I've been a soccer player my whole life," he said. "I'm playing intramurals right now, so that's nice. But back home, it's the main sport, so it's more passionate."

He said these absences are small losses compared to the education he is getting at K-State, though.

"That's just stuff I have to get rid of for a good education," he said.

Man enjoys challenge as nursery CEO

BY SARAH RICE
Kansas State Collegian

During a typical work day, Keith Westervelt pays bills, writes out goals for his employees, moves tree saplings around with a tractor, answers customer phone calls and attends his daughter's volleyball game.

Westervelt, CEO of Blueville Nursery, takes on many roles throughout his day.

Westervelt manages Blueville Nursery, a landscaping and garden center. The company landscapes residential and commercial areas, sells plants and gardening material, installs sprinkler systems and grows trees and shrubs for sale.

Westervelt's background includes agricultural and business experience. He received his bachelor of science degree with a major in agricultural education from K-State in 1985.

Although Westervelt's parents owned Blueville at the time of his graduation, he moved to Oklahoma to work for Greenleaf, a wholesale nursery, and then to St. Louis.

However, when his mother became ill in 1998, he and his family moved back to Manhattan.

"A lot of the move was for family reasons, and Blueville was just a way to make a living," Westervelt said.

The stockholders of the company decided they would rather have one of the owners' sons take over the business rather than hire a new person.

"My parents wanted someone with the nursery blood," he said. "They wanted to keep the same morals and standards."

After taking the job as CEO, Westervelt learned the ropes. However, he said it was a hard adjustment.

"It was hard switching from sales to management," he said. "I want to be a people pleaser, but as a manager you can't. I have to make the best decision for the whole group and the majority of the employees."

Westervelt said he is good at what he does because he likes to work with people and has strong vision.

"I do have a vision of where I want Blueville to go," he said. "The team has to be on the same page, and I am the quarterback."

Derrek Marteney, Blueville growing supervisor, said that energy is what makes Westervelt perfect for the job.

"He has wads and wads of energy."

He goes from sun up to sun down," Marteney said. "He never gets tired of people, which makes him suitable for this job."

Although the company is busy in the spring and fall, Westervelt tries to sit the employees down in the winter to regroup.

"We strategize and figure out what we have got to do," he said.

Blueville office manager Merry Magill said Westervelt is learning to cope with the stresses of being CEO.

"He is learning to delegate," she said. "He moves around plants to let off steam."

Westervelt said he finds happiness in his job because of the nature of what he does.

"I like watching things grow," he said. "I take a lot of pride in the employees that we hire."

Westervelt said Blueville currently employs 50 to 60 K-State students.

"We like to hire them as freshmen," he said. "They are paid by the number of hours they have worked. So as a senior, they are doing pretty well."

Westervelt's advice to students interested in business is to get a wide variety of experiences including summer internships.

"Each summer of college, I took an internship," he said. "It gives you an idea of what you want to do when you get out of college."

He also encouraged students to enroll in many different courses, even though they might not seem to be directly related to a business career.

"I would have taken more economics and business, but also psychology," he said. "It helps you deal with people. You need to know what makes guys tick. This can help you work on their strengths, rather than weaknesses."

Zach Long/Collegian

Keith Westervelt is the CEO of Blueville Nursery. The nursery has been part of Manhattan since the 1970s.

Westervelt said the most difficult part of beginning a business career is finding the right company.

"You have to match your strengths with a company that has those same strengths," he said. "You need to work for someone before you start your own business."

Another challenge Westervelt has had to manage is the balance between work and family obligations. Westervelt and his wife, Sheri, have two daughters and a son.

"There is always work to do here," he said. "You just have to walk out the door and take time off to spend with the kids. If they have a game, I put it on the calendar and go to it because kids grow up quickly."

Morning bomb threat leads to MHS evacuation

BY MICHAEL WATSON
Kansas State Collegian

Students at Manhattan High School were evacuated and dismissed after the school received a bomb threat Wednesday morning.

The bomb threat was called in at 10:05 a.m. The caller was female, and she left a short, nonchalant message and then hung up. There was no time frame given with the bomb threat, Kathy Pfeifley, receptionist at the Robinson Education Center, said.

Pfeifley said the caller did not specify which campus, east or west, had the bomb. She only said Manhattan High. The west campus, on Sunset Avenue, was evacuated.

"When people hear Manhattan High School, they think of the west campus," she said. "I didn't hear of any talk of evacuating the other campus. Since they heard high school, they felt pretty confident that it was the west campus."

Superintendent Shari Little said the school's crisis plan was followed to make sure students and staff were kept safe. The school was locked down to search the exterior of the school.

"If you remember schools in Kentucky, they had a shooting outside," Little said. "We had a lock down first to make sure it was safe, and then we told students to get their keys and leave."

Officers found no bomb on site, but Marcia Bone, associate superintendent for sight support, said the school wanted to err on the side of safety. Evacuation at the west campus took about one hour.

Junior Stephanie Barber said the school has received threats before, but they have never been this serious.

"I think this is scary, especially with everything that has been going on," Barber said. "There have been threats before, but we've never been evacuated before. This one is a lot more serious than the other ones."

Little said this is a serious issue. The school does not want to hear more threats.

"We don't want copy cats," she said.

"Students are missing assignments and missing activities. Students will have to make that up. They will add to the school day. They will add to the school year."

The Riley County Police Department traced the call. That information still is under investigation.

"This is just a random threat," John Winkler, RCPD resource officer, said.

Students can benefit from adviser survey

This semester, you will have the chance to advise your adviser. Before students can enroll on KATS for the spring, they will have to fill out an electronic survey about their adviser's performance.

As usual, students should meet with their adviser, and once their flag to enroll is lifted, they will have to fill out the questionnaire on KATS before they enroll.

Mike Lynch, associate vice president, said the survey will take no more than two to three minutes to complete. Lynch said the administration is looking for the maximum amount of input from students.

Advisers are an integral part of students' experience. They are needed to help maneuver students through their educational track. Advisers are around to make sure students are on the most efficient path.

Many students feel as though meeting with their adviser is a waste of time or that they have been led astray by an adviser.

This survey will be the vehicle to voice your concerns about your adviser.

Take the time and fill out the survey. But don't just fill it out quickly. Fill it out honestly.

To the guy who wrote the Taliban quote on Tuesday, that was the funniest quote I read all year. Thanks.

I will be the first one to join the Terence Newman fan club.

This is Kansas State University, and yet the Collegian doesn't know how to spell bales. B-A-L-E-S.

I think it is sad the Taliban have been committing humanitarian atrocities for years against their own people, but the U.S. does not think of dismantling them until it affects us.

I think left-handed people should be forced to move to Canada with all the other weirdos.

I think we should change the name of Operation Enduring Freedom to Operation Woop Ass. Who is with me?

I am for one glad the terrorist attacks have not affected our mullet situation in any way. God Bless America.

Tom Cruise is left handed? He is also a midget. I wonder how that guy ever got chicks.

If being a part of Terence Newman fan club means getting free cookies made by him, count me in.

I would like to thank the chemistry department today for getting me high off of noxious fumes. Right now, I don't know what I am doing.

Joe Elkinton, the only thing we agree with is you are a loser.

K-State receivers, your job description is to receive. So catch the football.

Thanks, Matt Killingsworth, for your article, but how do you know Kermit the Frog is left handed?

To the person who called in the "mister Taliban tally me bananas" comment — I heard that on Saturday Night Live, too. Keep us posted on other SNL sketches, Mr. personality.

Living for yourself

Women should choose own paths despite comments

I grew up knowing I could try to be anything I wanted to be.

Kansas Senator Kay O'Connor said that is not only a horrible thing, but also the downfall of society.

Last week, O'Connor said women being allowed to vote was "not necessarily" in the best interest of the nation. In fact, she thinks the 19th Amendment began the slide down a slippery slope for America in terms of traditional family values.

O'Connor thinks voting forces women out of the home, where she says they belong.

I agree that women's suffrage changed society forever.

And it's great.

Today's little girl can play with her Barbies and dress them up for Malibu outings with Ken (although Barbie could do better — Ken is so plastic). She can dream of and someday create her very own family with her man. She can have the best-looking living room in the tri-state area.

But that living room can be decorated by a designer the girl hires with her big, fat executive-style paycheck.

Women are so much closer to having everything they want. They can become domestics, professionals or any balance of the two.

O'Connor, however, seems to think women should have only one particular role: helplessness. According to the Sept. 28 edition of The Kansas City Star, she said, "I'm sorry women have not been taken more care of. We have gotten the short end of the stick."

If women have the short end of any stick, it's because people with views like hers still exist.

Maybe our friend Kay just hasn't been taken care of enough. She claims that her ill daughter's medical bills forced her to re-enter the workplace.

Perhaps she should have chosen a husband who could "take care" of her more. She could have abandoned the man she wanted to marry for the Duke of Earl or an oil tycoon.

I am learning more and more every day to take care of myself. If I ever choose a husband, it will not be for his ability to support me financially. A marriage should be a joining of two friends, two lovers, who want to walk through life together as equals.

Part of me wonders if O'Connor bows to her husband when he gets home. Maybe she brings him his slippers in her mouth.

When O'Connor said women need men as their caretakers, she missed the point. Some women don't even have this option.

Who is to say I ever will get married? What about women who are widowed, divorced or separated?

I have news for O'Connor. Life today is not straight out of a Jane Austen novel. I never will live with my family or "marry for convenience" just because I am a woman.

That's the way it should be.

The senator deserves credit for her brazen honesty. Yet, there is something sickening about her having a governmental office.

She claims she was forced into her position — her prominent, public position.

Why, Kay? You could have been a cook, a nanny or a nurse. There once was a time when women either were teachers or nurses, but now they have more options. Why did you have to choose government? Do you make professional decisions all by yourself, or do you go home to check with your husband first?

O'Connor said it herself: "I offer my suggestions, but I give (my husband) the right to make the final decision."

She votes, too. Who the heck made her vote? Did a member of the so-called male establishment put a gun to her head and walk her to the booth?

O'Connor only serves to add to my embarrassment as a Kansan.

Remember the State Board of Education's decision not to allow the teaching of evolution in schools? At the time, I thought I could not be more ashamed of my state. I could see others in the nation thinking of us as backward hee-haws.

Thanks, Kay. My fellow citizens already think we are uneducated religious zealots.

May our midwestern state be blessed because we quickly will lose credibility among our peers if we keep electing these people.

Please vote, all women and men. Elect an individual who looks ahead, or at least lives in the now. These backward ideas have got to go.

To all the ladies: Be a homemaker, be a CEO. I don't care what you do as long as you respect the choices of those around you. That goes for men, too. Enjoy your right to either work or stay at home.

In the meantime, I will be working toward the degree that just might take me wherever I want to go. Someday, you'll see me using Kay's self-implemented glass ceiling as my corner office floor.

Remembering loved ones helps survivors in grieving process

Too stunned to speak, my brother, Matt, and I followed my grandmother's red Ford Taurus through the streets of Bonner Springs, Kan.

We rode silently in his truck, driving toward the local funeral parlor. Though the trip took minutes, my body had the numbness of an extensive road trip.

Matt opened the glass door to the building, giving me a moment to muster the courage to pass through. Upon entering, I froze. Artificial stillness assaulted me. The foyer, its furniture, its dark red carpet, all seemed too inanimate. Even the scent offered by a small vase of flowers rested on each petal, too stagnant, too dormant to be moved.

Sadly, too many Americans have experienced a similar journey since Sept. 11.

I watch the reports on television, the somber expressions, the tears shed by those who are supposed to make us laugh. I hear nothing but the absence of laughter.

And with America, I grieve. I feel the stillness, that forceful dormancy of the funeral parlor creep not only into me, but into the American conscience.

I cannot imagine the suffering of those who lost loved ones due to the attacks. My experiences with death, thankfully have, been few, and none within recent years. I lost my grandfather when I was just a middle-school adolescent, too absorbed with fitting in and making new friends to realize he was seriously ill.

Yet, like Sept. 11, his death came, swift and abrupt. All wailing and sobbing had been purged at my grandmother's house, where she had informed me of her husband's passing. I possessed no sound, just steady tears, silently streaming down my face.

Those tears have multiplied by the thousands, taking residency in the eye of all affected Americans. I turned my face toward the casket, to shield my grandmother from any further grief. Suddenly, I stepped forward, intimately staring at my grandfather's too-perfect face. I could smell the makeup as I kissed one cheek, then the other, "To balance it out," I explained.

My grandmother smiled. I walked over to her, searching for any words of comfort, and suddenly blurted, "Well, at least he's doing what he did best." "What's that, dear?" "Sleeping."

The heavy sorrow weighing down my grandmother's thin cheeks soon lifted. She offered another smile, followed by a generous laugh. Soft laughter permeated the stillness, breathing life into the stifled room.

America's own vitality, creativity and joy has been stifled.

After the attacks, The New Yorker ran an issue featuring no comics, happening only once before, when an entire issue was devoted to the bombing of Hiroshima. Comedians and talk show hosts neglected their monologues and satire. Premiere weeks for fall sitcoms were postponed out of respect for our nation's mourning.

With each passing week, the wailing and sobbing soon turned, again, to silence. The tragedy possessed our thoughts, our emotions, leaving us drained, empty.

We need to grieve, but we do not need to dwell.

The death and destruction will not fade. They shall remain ever-present in America's eyes and heart. However, we should not allow the victims and their tragic demise to cast a permanent shadow over our lives. Remember the victims for who they were: how they smiled or laughed or slept. Not how they perished.

Among the stillness, I can hear America laugh again. The comics have been reintroduced, the monologues have broken the silence and soft laughter is crumbling the stony facade. A facade that we have been beaten, our survivors left in silence. A facade that we never will again feel joy.

Excess of political leaders' power could hinder others

Editor,

John V. Graham's opinion column shows little knowledge of the subject he is writing about. He believes that term limits are bad. He does not believe that "career politicians" are bad or that it causes corruption.

I agree that most people are good and not corrupt, but for those who get in power and stay, it becomes easy to become corrupt.

Robert Mugabe, president of Zimbabwe, has been ruling since that country's independence in 1980. He gets "re-elected" through a network of intimidation.

In 1933, Adolf Hitler was democratically elected chancellor of Germany. After he assumed power, there were no need for elections. He was able to establish a police force that hunted down and oppressed all opposition.

In Belarus, Aleksandr Lukashenko was elected in 1995. After he came to power, he introduced a referendum to increase his power at the expense of parliament. He also extended the length of his term by two years (to 2001). His government has been criticized for human-rights abuses, including being responsible for the disappearance of its political opponents.

There are other examples I could present to you, including Benito Mussolini. But the message I am trying to get across is that if any one person is allowed too much power, others will suffer. We like to think that the United States is indestructible because of our freedoms, but it is us who have to keep our freedoms from being taken away by power-hungry politicians. Power corrupts.

KATS survey to evaluate academic adviser performance

BY SHANNON MARSHALL
Kansas State Collegian

In addition to determining a student's schedule for next semester, this fall's enrollment also will determine the effectiveness of each student's adviser at K-State.

Before they can enroll in classes on KATS for the spring semester, students must complete an electronic survey regarding their individual academic adviser.

Previously, the university surveyed students every four years about academic advisers. The yearly surveys are a result of a 1999 Board of Regents report.

"The Regents report stipulated that feedback about student advising was needed," Mike Lynch, associate vice president, said.

"The Provost appointed an Advising Enhancement task force that consisted of academic advisers, students, faculty and administrators, and they came up with a set of initiatives the university should take to improve its academics."

In the two-year period that followed the formation of the task force, a subcommittee formed to evaluate the effectiveness of academic advisers. Lynch said a survey on KATS seemed like the easiest way to reach students.

"We were looking for a way to get the maximum amount of input," he said.

As pre-enrollment approaches, students will visit with their academic advisers to discuss appropriate courses for the next semester. Once the advising is complete, each student's department will raise an advising "flag" on KATS that will allow the student to enroll in his or her classes. It is at this time that the adviser survey can be completed.

"The whole process will take somewhere between two and three minutes," Lynch said.

The survey will ask the name of the student's adviser, and also if the student has conferred with his or her adviser. A series of nine statements will follow, such as "I can contact my adviser when I need to," and "My adviser takes enough time to answer all of my questions." Students then can answer each statement with "Definitely False," "More False than True," "More True than False," "Definitely True" or "Can't Judge."

The advising questionnaire will be activated Monday. It can be accessed 24 hours a day until Oct. 22. After that time, it can be accessed from 7 a.m. until 9 p.m.

Lynch said encouraged, students to complete the survey as soon as they consult with their adviser.

"If students complete the survey prior to enrollment, it takes some of the load off the computer system," he said. "The shorter the time they're logged in, the more efficient the KATS system can work."

The information collected from the surveys will be compiled into three different reports. The first report will be given to each department head. A second report will be given to the individual college, with a copy of the reports sent to each department head. The third report, which also will consist of university-wide information, will be submitted to the provost. This report will include a copy of the other two reports.

Individual, anonymous adviser reports only will be generated if they are requested by the adviser.

"This is to protect the confidentiality of the students who responded," Lynch said.

Provost James Coffman, who appointed the Advising Enhancement task force, said the new annual survey will improve the quality of academic advising at K-State.

"If we don't have good data to evaluate the quality of advising program by program, we don't have any real basis upon which to make changes," he said. "This will give us the data."

Labels, studios sue Napster stepchild for copyright infringement

BY RON HARRIS
The Associated Press

SAN FRANCISCO — Large music labels and movie studios are suing the makers and distributors of a Napster stepchild that lets users freely trade music, movies and software on the Internet.

Plaintiffs — including MGM Studios, Columbia Pictures, and the Sony and Warner music groups — filed the copyright-infringement suit late Tuesday in federal court.

The file-sharing software was developed by Amsterdam-based Consumer Empowerment BV, also known as FastTrack, and is licensed to MusicCity and Grokster. None of the companies being sued responded to phone calls and e-mails from The Associated Press seeking comment.

MusicCity is based in Franklin, Tenn., and Grokster operates from the island of Nevis in the West Indies.

Grokster and MusicCity license and distribute nearly identical software that allows users to look for, trade and copy computer files.

The versions of the software can communicate fluently with each other.

The software's popularity has burgeoned since Napster went offline earlier this year in an effort to comply with a court order that it cease maintaining a network of users trading copyright music.

Figures released Wednesday by Webnoize showed an average of 1 million simultaneous users on the FastTrack network during September, up from 580,000 in August. During September, users downloaded 1.51 billion files.

"The FastTrack network already is very close to the levels that Napster was at during its peak,"

Webnoize analyst Matt Bailey, said.

He predicted that Morpheus and Grokster users would be difficult for the entertainment industry to stifle because they seldom log on to central servers.

Instead, FastTrack users' personal PCs act as a hub to connect file-sharing users with each other.

The suit seeks to stop the defendants from violating copyrights, and asks for the maximum damages allowable by law, $150,000 for each infringed work.

The recording industry hopes to further combat unauthorized file-sharing by launching its own subscription online music services later this year. MusicNet will offer content from the BMG, EMI and Warner labels, while pressplay will offer EMI, Sony and Universal content.

THIRTEEN STRAIGHT

Cats extend streak over KU, confidently finish homestand

BY DAN SMITH
Kansas State Collegian

Liz Wegner knew coming in that little would be left to chance Wednesday night on the floor of Ahearn Field House.

"K-State doesn't lose to KU," Wegner said after the Cats' three-set win.

But K-State's 13th consecutive win over KU wasn't a gimme.

"We knew they'd come out and they'd play a really tough game against us," Wegner said. "It's a really big rivalry."

Despite falling behind early, 5-2 in the first set, the Jayhawks (11-4, 2-4) used several big runs to keep the game close, but four straight K-State (8-4, 4-2) points with KU up two midway through the first set gave K-State early momentum.

"We knew they'd come out tough," Wegner said. "Two in-state teams playing against each other, and we knew they'd come out and be on fire. We were ready for it. We just had to get in our groove and get going."

K-State seemed to find that groove at just the right time, too, using a 7-1 run in the opening moments of game two to keep the Jayhawks at bay long enough to gain a two-set advantage using solid team defense.

The Wildcats also depended heavily on the offensive attacks of Wegner and junior Jenny Pollard, who finished the game with an .800 hitting percentage and four kills, as well, to lead by as many as 11 in the second game.

"I think we just needed to create some energy," Wegner said, "and I thought we did a good job of that coming into the second game."

Game three was played at much the same tempo as the first game, with a give-and-take style dominating most of the action. Afterwards, Kansas coach Ray Bechard said that style of play ultimately suited the Cats more than his team.

"We made some runs at them, but they're a veteran team, and they didn't panic," he said. "They stayed within their system. There were some times when I thought they were a little bit more confident than we were in those two tight games that we had."

Building that confidence back up was a big part of head coach Suzie Fritz's game plan after falling in three games to Nebraska earlier this week, and although that confidence showed at times, her team failed to come up with big plays consistently.

"We needed this one for sure, especially after a relatively emotional loss on Monday," she said. "I felt like we played better on Monday, but fortunately, tonight we were able to not play out a game and still win the match."

Although the Cats didn't play their best volleyball of the season against KU, Pollard said the win was important for the team on other levels.

"It was a really good win for us after pushing through four games in eight days," she said. "It was kinda fatiguing, but it's KU, and we're here at home, so we had to bring it and make energy, and we did tonight."

Fritz earns win against mentor, Jayhawk squad

BY LAURA BOYD
Kansas State Collegian

Wednesday night's match against KU affected head coach Suzie Fritz on a personal level.

Fritz wasn't just going up against the Wildcats' intrastate rival Kansas Jayhawks. She was going up against her teacher, ex-coach and friend, KU head coach Ray Bechard.

"He is very special to me," Fritz said of Bechard. "He is a good friend and has always been very good to me."

Fritz played under Bechard at Barton County Community College from 1990 to 1991. As a starting setter, Fritz led the team to back-to-back final four championships and was named the Cougar's most valuable player in the 1991 season. In 1996, she returned to Barton County and served as an assistant coach to

Freshman tennis player experiences early success

BY LAURA BOYD
Kansas State Collegian

At just 10 years old, freshman Maria Rosenberg knew she had a love for tennis. Last weekend, in her K-State debut at the Georgia Bulldog Fall Invitational, she proved it was her skills more than her love of the game that would make her stand out on this team.

ROSENBERG

"I didn't really know what to expect," Rosenberg said about her first match at the college level. "The competition is very high, but I like that better."

Going into last weekend's matches as the No. 3 spot, Rosenberg made herself known staying undefeated in singles play.

Rosenberg defeated Miami and Notre Dame to go 4-0 in singles. She also split in doubles play with sophomore partner Hayley McIver with a win over Miami and a loss to Notre Dame.

"Maria is great in doubles," McIver said. "She is a tenacious player and could play forever."

As a sophomore, McIver let her experience guide Rosenberg through play last weekend.

"She is easily motivated and keeps the ball in play," McIver said. "With new players, sometimes it is tough, but she has caught on well to everything we do and is very consistent on the court."

With only seven players on the team, the importance of teamwork definitely comes into play, Rosenberg said getting to know the women and spending time with them builds a great relationship that is reflected on the court.

K-State cross country wouldn't settle for anything but first place at Wednesday's Harrier Relays.

And they proved it, as both the men's and women's squads swept UMKC in Topeka.

"The format is a little different," head coach Randy Cole said. "With the schools being split up into two-person relay teams and alternating with their teammate after each mile, you get to see some good efforts out there."

The K-State women grabbed the top three spots to outscore UMKC 15-6, led by Cate Holston and Amy Mortimer's first place in the six-mile with a combined time of 34:13.

Six seconds later, Trisha Culbertson and Amanda Crouse-Beinke crossed the finish line to take second, and Shauna Burrell and Jaime Thurman ran a 36:35 to nab third position.

"Everyone really accomplished a lot today," Cole said. "We got some great workouts, and we got better efforts out of everyone than we would have had it been a normal day of training."

Meanwhile, the Wildcat men topped the Kangaroos 11-10, led by Shadrack Kimeli and Eric Sproll's first-place finish in the eight-mile with a combined time of 40:10.

Derek George and Reid Christianson's mark of 40:52 was good enough to claim third, and Mark Holcomb and Dieter Myers chugged in at sixth with a time of 41:52.

Cole said it was a good meet all around for the Cat cross country squads, as they now prepare for the Oct. 13 Chili Pepper Invitational in Fayetteville, Ark.

"Both teams dug down deep," Cole said.

"We had good splits on the mile loop. It was just an overall good competition and a good effort."

Hunting prey needs to be fair

You poor sucker. You probably think the biggest thing happening in sports right now is college football — the Texas/Oklahoma game. Or maybe you're pumped about week four of the NFL. Or, even worse, you're excited about the beginning of hockey season. You poor sucker. You're missing out on the most important sports crisis to hit the United States in years. I am, of course, referring to the raging debate in Oregon over whether it should be legal to shoot bears if they are attacking people. Such action is now illegal.

Now, you're probably telling yourself that hunting sounds like a non-sports related issue. You're wrong. It has its own section on ESPN.com, along with fishing. So stop talking and keep reading.

This is a big issue. If hunting truly is a sport, then sportsmanship is at the very heart of the matter. As in all sports, one team never is allowed an unfair advantage over another. In football, the defense is allowed to tackle the ball carrier — the players' hands are not tied behind their backs. In hockey, one toothless thug is allowed to beat the crap out of another toothless thug.

In Oregon, though, legislators want to eliminate such sportsmanship from hunting. The law now allows the killing of bears to protect sheep and tree saplings, which is perfectly fair. A sheep has no chance against a 500-pound Black Bear with big claws and big teeth. In the same way, a sapling is defenseless against a Grizzly Bear with an itch. Therefore, it is justified to level the playing field with firearms. If sheep could, they would wear camouflage and carry grenade launchers. But they can't, so people do it for them.

However, the situation is completely different for the relationship between people and bears. In many places, people are allowed to hunt bears for sport. The hunter has a gun or bow and stalks a bear that has no gun or bow. Not only that, but hunters also use sophisticated networks to track bears in the field. There's even an entire hunting Web site devoted to recording bear sightings. The odds are completely in the hunters' favors.

Just to make myself clear, though, I'm not arguing against hunting. There is absolutely nothing wrong with a person going out into the wilderness to shoot a bear. The bears just need to have some recourse for revenge.

Therefore, it is perfectly logical that when the roles reverse, bears should be allowed to hunt people in the same manner. The bears have big claws and teeth, and they stalk people who trim their fingernails.

Sounds fair to me. The Oregon Legislature, on the other hand, refuses to take the bears' part. It wants to give people the power to wait in bed under the covers with a high-powered rifle. Then, when the bear comes around, bang. No more bear — only a nice living room ornament.

This just isn't right. In a similar sport, hide-and-go-seek, the person hiding is not allowed to blow away the seeker. That's just not how it works. The same principle applies to bears and people. No bear lies in its den waiting to put a cap in some hunter. No, the bear is just sitting around, having a Bud, watching the game when it suddenly decides that it sure could use another slab of beaver. The bear steps outside and gets shot down like in a gangland murder.

The bears need to have the ability to get even — that is, if hunting them truly is a sport. Anytime a bear is nosing through the garbage of some new housing development and accidentally eats Fluffy the poodle, the owner just needs to let it go. It could have been him.

So, if you go camping and a bear is attracted by the smell of roasting hot dogs, don't shoot it. Just let the bear have its way. That's just the bear's way of getting even at people for hunting it.

If you are carrying a gun and do take a couple of potshots at the bear, don't be surprised if it's waiting for you when you get home.

That's sportsmanship.

Atish Patel, sophomore in biology, has invested a large amount of time into customizing his car. From the tail lights to interior, Patel has given the vehicle its own unique

Cars with character

Love of automobiles translates into refurbishing

BY BETSY STVERAK
Kansas State Collegian

Those fanatical about customizing their cars are willing to devote time and money into juicing up their prized possessions.

"I wanted my car to be at its maximum power and its ultimate shape," Atish Patel, sophomore in biology said.

The trend always is growing. Many people can be seen working hard on anything from muscle cars to import models, said Tony Zafran, Uncivilized Heroes car club member.

Patel said he loves improving his car because it makes him feel good.

"It's like a hobby," he said. "If you're stressed out, just go and open up your car and start working."

Patel said he first discovered he liked cars several years ago.

"I was first into cars at the age of 11," he said. "I got it from my older brother."

Over the years, Patel said the time he puts into his hobby has greatly increased.

"I have spent more than $6,000 on my car," he said.

Patel said he has changed almost everything about his 2000 Honda Civic. It all started with putting on 17-inch wheels, changing the interior from black to red and installing clear euro lights, he said.

Next, he fixed up the entire exhaust system and changed all the interior bulbs to blue, he said. Patel said he set the lights to change colors.

"When the ladies want to be impressed, I switch the mode to black light inside," he said. "You can have your own little disco in there."

For someone interested in improving their car, Patel said to start off with changing a few things.

"Mess with the engine, put on some shiny wheels and drop it a bit," he said. "For the looks, put the wheels on, for the performance work on the engine."

Carlos Carvalho is another huge fan of improving cars. Carvalho, owner of Perfect Sound and Performance maintenance shop, said he is so fascinated with cars that he decided to start a club.

The club, called Uncivilized Heroes, has about 15 to 20 members and only deals with Hondas and Acuras, he said. The club meets every second Saturday of the month.

"We talk about car shows, new members and car parts," he said. "We basically input information." Carvalho said Uncivilized Heroes has competed all over the state of Kansas.

"We've been anywhere from Kansas City and Topeka to Wichita and Salina," he said. "We've been in contests for both looks and performance."

Even with all the hard and time-consuming work, Carvalho said he hopes the club teaches the members a few things.

"I want them to have an appreciation for other cars," he said, "to build a lasting friendship with others based on their interests."

Zafran said the club has had a positive effect on members.

"It gives the kids a place to be," he said. "They can go out and talk about it, kind of like a release."

With his 1996 Honda, Zafran said he has been involved in many competitions and not walked away disappointed.

"I've competed in everything from drag racing to car showing," he said. "I got runner-up in the Midwest raceway."

With all the existing cars, Zafran said anyone can work on any car as long as the parts are available.

"You can come in with a 1980s-model car and work with it," he said. "It doesn't matter what your car looks like today — it's what it could look like tomorrow."

Maintained by an obviously disturbed staff of writers and pranksters, Something Awful is a satire site worth checking out.

The site basically is a more computer nerd-oriented version of The Onion with no advertisements. A banner at the top offers people the chance to donate through PayPal to keep the site running since there are no ads. Something Awful is full of hilarious tidbits, like a list of hated people and satirical news. Unfortunately, some of the links are broken, but most of it runs fine.

CURRENCY CALCULATOR

www.x-rates.com/calculator.html

This little tool is about as fun to play with as it can be useful for anyone planning on taking a trip outside the country.

List what country's currency you are converting from and to, then just hit the calculate button, and it spits the figures back at you. About every country you could expect to visit is available.

You also can graph the recent histories of the two currencies compared to each other and see photos of the money. Both historic and custom tables are available for researching currency.

It could be useful for those interested in economics or just traveling, or it could just be a fun little toy to know about.

"We all get along well on and off the court," Rosenberg said. "I am getting to know the girls on a more personal level as the season goes on."

Though the team is small, McIver said she is confident that all the players are strong enough to move up in the lineup if need be. With the loss of power senior Eva Novotna, the team knows someone will have to step up and fill her shoes.

That responsibility might lean on Rosenberg if she keeps up her strong singles play and improves in doubles throughout the fall and into the spring season. Rosenberg said the bond the team is forming makes her want to try all the more and have that competitive edge.

"You don't want to let your teammates down in those tough matches," she said.

"I am learning from the older girls and am getting better, faster because of that."

The K-State tennis team appealed to Rosenberg first during her senior year of high school. Finishing regular season play 33-0 at Manhattan High School, Rosenberg went on to win state that year, proving she was ready for college-level play.

"I chose K-State because they always play strong competition, making play more interesting," Rosenberg said.

That, along with her interest in graphic design and a desire to be close to home, made K-State the perfect choice.

Though Rosenberg spent the last two years at Manhattan High, the Little Apple is just the latest stop in a history of moves for the Rosenberg family. Rosenberg was born and raised in Russia until the age of 6, when her family moved to the United States. After a few short years in the United States, her family then moved to France, then again to Germany. It wasn't until two years ago that she came back to the United States and her family settled in Manhattan.

Though Rosenberg's experiences might seem to exceed those of most people, it is her abilities that will take her through this chapter in her life, she said.

ARCHITECTURE

"I used to drink 44 oz. cups of coffee, two to three pots by myself, but I'd also have a 12-pack of Coke that I'd sell," he said.

Richardson said students in architecture usually figure out how much work it involves. Some decide they're not right for the job.

"Look at enrollment for third year, fourth year, fifth year, and you'll see a decrease," he said. "But if you don't like it, you better get out of it."

Lynn Ewanow, associate dean of architecture, said enrollment does go down somewhat from year to year, but she said the people who realize architecture is not for them should be admired for realizing that.

"The students who are here who decide this isn't for them and get out of it, that's OK. You wouldn't want somebody to be a doctor and not enjoy the profession," she said. "The greatest number will leave between the first and second years."

Ewanow said she thought the enrollment decreased about 15 percent last year.

Condia said the decrease was as much as 50 percent in the past, but he also stressed that it was OK if students realized they weren't cut out for architecture.

"What you'll usually find is they usually end up being successful in another college," he said.

Spending so much time in studio, the students said sometimes they just need to get their minds off architecture.

"Some people go smoke — just anything to get your mind off this for a little while," Hanke said.

Swartz also said people sometimes need a reliever, and they have to talk about something besides architecture.

"You have to get up and walk away even if you don't smoke. Anything's fun to get your mind off this," he said.

"You have to talk about other stuff. I'm not quite that pathetic yet."

Swartz said sometimes it seems as if all the hours he and his classmates work don't result in fairness.

"The best thing about studio is you can work 80 hours a week and still get a 'C,'" he said. "That's justice."

Still, he said the long hours, days and nights will be worth it all in the end.

"We wouldn't be here if it didn't pay off."

Bechard for the next two years.

"He was instrumental in my start in coaching," Fritz said. "I learned a lot from him."

So what was said before their first meeting as head coaches? Not much, Fritz said.

"I want a lot for him, and he wants a lot for me," Fritz said. "But we are not the ones playing. The girls are."

Fritz said the meeting of these two teams was something K-State was looking forward to after a tough loss to Nebraska on Monday. A fatigued team, K-State went out there to prove they were the stronger team in this competition, she said.

"We needed this after our emotional loss Monday," Fritz said. "KU played aggressive defense, but we managed to do well staying in the system."

Though Bechard was disappointed about the loss, he was happy to see Fritz succeed.

"She had a lot of desire as a player," Bechard said. "She has brought this to her coaching, and you can see its effect on the team."

Bechard praised Fritz's collective nature on the court. He said he believes her composure has a calming effect on the team helping to keep their confidence high.

"She has been a big part of K-State's program the last few years," Bechard said. "The team is comfortable with her, and it shows."

Bechard also said he gives credit to K-State's strong system and power players.

"They are a better team and collectively fought harder,"

Bechard said. "Their play definitely speaks well of her."

Though few words were spoken between the two before the game, the mutual respect was evident, Fritz said. Bechard had to be proud of his former player and associate seeing her success as a first-year head coach of a power team.

"When we shook hands before the game, all I could think was, 'Wow,'" Bechard said.

The feeling after the game didn't seem to change as the two exchanged a hug and a smile. No more needed to be said.

MASCOT

mascot ideas.

The Indian was chosen from six proposals.

The headline in the Manhattan High Mentor announcing the change read "MHS goes primitive, Injuns selected as mascot," he said.

Matt Walters, Manhattan resident, celebrated the proud tradition of the Indian mascot.

"If you change the mascot, you will alienate people over 50 years who were part of this institution," he said.

Ben Procter, freshman in political science, argued for a change in mascot due to today's societal values.

"Regardless of a material's original intent, we have to accept the standards of modern society when we look to evaluate the racial implications created by that work," he said.

Michael Miller, Manhattan resident, warned the board members of the implications of retaining the mascot.

"It's derogatory and hurtful," he said.

"I know Manhattan is not a racist town, but if this would stay, it could be seen as a racist town on a national level."

Sonder Smith, freshman in pre-pharmacy and biology, encouraged the board to keep the mascot and teach respect.

"Give our students something to feel honorable about," she said.

"Do not solve the problem by hiding from it. Teach students acceptance through action, not avoidance. Use this as a positive teaching tool."

Callie Laue, Manhattan High student, pleaded with members to get on with more important issues.

"We are creating irrelevant problems instead of worrying about our education," she said.

Amber Long, Manhattan High student, also asked the board to keep the Indians.

"It depicts something to strive for," she said.

"If people take offense, they are going out of their way to be offended."

Although many students said they have not witnessed disrespectful attitudes of students, Doug Benson, Manhattan resident, said he has seen it many times.

"I've seen the war hoop, tomahawk chops and heard them say 'Let's scalp 'em,'" he said.

Pat Staver, Manhattan resident, said this is not a political decision, but a moral one.

"It is wrong to use the Indian people as a mascot. One of the strengths of democracy is the minority is heard. Using any people as a mascot is morally wrong."

Grant Parker, Manhattan High student, said that if the board members will not listen to the minority and change the mascot, then at least they can come to some compromise and make changes in the way the mascot is treated.

"If the only thing that comes out of all of this controversy would be a series of letters to the editor and increased board meeting attendance, this would have been an enormous waste of time," he said.

"What the board can do without completely changing the mascot is to make sure that action is taken to make the mascot less offensive."

Indian hijacking false alarm; anonymous call triggers panic

BY LAURINDA KEYS
The Associated Press

NEW DELHI, India — The reported hijacking of an Indian jetliner on a domestic flight Wednesday night was a false alarm caused by an anonymous phone call and confusion aboard the aircraft, the government said.

Earlier, civil aviation officials said hijackers seized a Boeing 737 jetliner shortly after its departure from Bombay late Wednesday night, reportedly with 54 people on board.

National security force commandos surrounded the plane early Thursday at Indira Gandhi International Airport in New Delhi. Fire vehicles and ambulances ringed the runway, and a fuel tanker was parked in front to prevent the jet from taking off.

Several hours later, Civil Aviation Minister Shahnawaz Hussain called it a false alarm triggered by an anonymous call reporting the hijacking to an air traffic control station.

"It was only after the commandos entered the cockpit that the pilot realized that it was a false alarm," Hussain said.

The Alliance Air jet had departed Bombay and was headed for New Delhi when the caller reported the plane hijacked, Hussain said.

After learning of the call from the air traffic controller, the pilot headed straight for New Delhi, skipping the scheduled stop in Ahmadabad, north of Bombay, Hussain said.

The pilot, Capt. Ashwini Behl, locked the cockpit door, thinking the hijackers were hidden among the passengers, Hussain said. The passengers thought the hijackers were in the cockpit.

After the pilot landed the plane on an isolated runway at the New Delhi airport, passengers called waiting relatives by cellular phone, many of them unaware of reports of a hijacking.

"At 2:30 a.m., the pilot announced that a hijacking had taken place, but he asked us not to panic," passenger Arun Sathe told The Associated Press. Commandos then boarded the plane, he said.

The passengers later were seen disembarking from the plane.

Airports throughout India have been on red alert status — the highest — since the Sept. 11 terror attacks in the United States.

Hussain said authorities would investigate who made the call. He refused to respond to reports that the incident was a security drill.

"We've been taking all precautions and we went through the full exercise. We took no chances," Hussain said. "We have taken all hoax calls seriously."

On Dec. 24, 1999, five hijackers seized an Indian Airlines flight carrying 178 passengers and 11 crew members after it left Nepal. After a weeklong standoff, hijackers left the plane after India agreed to release three prisoners. One passenger was killed.

even demands that the Bush administration promise not to strike Arab countries, said this is not the beginning of a conflict with them. Almost all Afghans are Muslims, but they are not Arabs.

With the Qatari emir at his side, Powell said at a news conference that while focusing at the outset on Osama bin Laden's network in Afghanistan, the U.S. campaign also takes note of those nations that provide haven, provide support, provide support to terrorist organizations.

In the three weeks since the terrorist attacks on New York and Washington, Powell has condemned Iraq frequently as a supporter of terrorism. Some senior officials in the Bush administration are known to support a strike against Baghdad as well as Afghanistan.

There also are Arab governments disturbed by the possibility that the United States might go that far in pursuing the al-Qaida network.

Powell's remarks did not appear to rule out an attack on Iraq.

While bin Laden has his headquarters in Afghanistan, Powell said, "He has elements of his network around the world."

"We are using all the tools available to us — financial tools, law enforcement, intelligence and the prospect of military operations as well — to go after this network."

A highway isn't the only common connection between K-State's Salina and Manhattan campuses. Purple pride also ties the two families together.

K-State-Salina celebrated a decade of development as an extended family member of K-State on Thursday afternoon.

"K-State added the Salina campus to expand the University's curriculum offerings and outreach capability," said David Delker, professor and head of the Department of Engineering. "The addition of the Salina campus also provided a major university presence in the western half of the state for students seeking degrees in technical professions."

In 1991, Gov. Joan Finney signed into law a bill that merged the two campuses. The College of Technology and Aviation became the ninth college in the K-State system.

"Our engineering technology programs, recognized for their excellence, allowed the expansion of programs originally in the College of Engineering," said Dennis Kuhlman, dean of the College of Technology. "Our top 10 in the nation aviation programs are unique in the Kansas Board of Regents system."

During the last decade, the Salina campus has seen growth in many areas. Kuhlman said 83,600 square feet of buildings have been added to the campus and 52,300 square feet of existing buildings have been renovated.

Delker said two new residence halls, the College Center building and a large expansion of the Technology Center building are additions that have greatly enhanced the campus facilities.

But what is on the inside counts, too, and has helped complete K-State-Salina's program.

K-State-Salina has received $2.1 million in new equipment, $9.5 million in grants for equipment, software or curricular upgrades, Kuhlman said. He also said in-gift support has increased $6.5 million during the decade.

Increased enrollment has made the College of Technology the fastest-growing college at K-State, Kuhlman said.

"The name recognition given by the K-State logo and reputation has been a very positive step in recruiting new students and faculty to our college," Delker said.

Jon Watkins, K-State-Salina 1999-2000 student body president and spring 2000 graduate, said he knew K-State would be home for him.

Middle East offers diverse cultures

 BY NANCY FOSTER
 Kansas State Collegian

A mother in Afghanistan grinds moldy bread and feeds it to her children, because she cannot work and she has no food.

Miles away in a bordering country, a Pakistani child labors away in a factory.

The child is part of Pakistan's workforce.

In Iran, a man returns home from a long day in the oil industry, hoping that if he is lucky, he will see the fruits of his labor.

Three bordering countries, three different lifestyles and three different economies.

And in nearby Israel, a man works at a mine, while another puts on a suit and heads to his office.

While these are not the stories of all who live in these countries, it is the story of many.

Their lifestyles are directly affected by their country's economy. For some, this might mean prosperity, but for many, it does not.

The economies in the Middle East and surrounding areas cannot be classified into one category because they are too diverse. Most are considered low to middle-income countries, but some border feudalism, and others are closer to capitalism.

By taking a look at several of these economies, one can begin to understand this region of the world.

Afghanistan

When asking about Afghanistan's economy, the response always is the same.

"There is none," said Mohamed El-Hodiri, professor of economics at the University of Kansas.

"It's a poor, God-forsaken country. There are no factories, no farms — there is nothing."

The country is a lot of mountains and little soil, El-Hodiri said.

Nothing was left after the 10-year war between Afghanistan and the Soviet Union that started in 1979, he said. During that time, around one-third of the population fled the country, and one million people died.

"A lot of the people living there now are the children of those dead people," he said.

The economy now relies on agriculture, but due to a two-year drought, it is suffering. Harvest after harvest is failing, and farmers are picking up and moving in hopes of finding help.

As the world's largest opium producer, with 75 percent of the world's crop, many Afghans survived by producing the country's premier cash crop — poppies.

However, last July, the ruling Taliban banned the cultivation of poppies. It called the drug production un-Islamic, though for years, the Taliban relied on the opium sales to fuel its wars.

Now, those who survived on the crop are left without jobs, and income.

"It's a very, very poor country," said Ibrahim Al-Omar, who is obtaining a Fewer than five Middle Eastern students at K-State have returned home since the terrorist attacks on the World Trade Center and Pentagon.

Director of the International Student Center Donna Davis said the students left to reassure their families — not because of anything that happened at K-State.

"Their families are worried. The parents are worried," she said. "They're hearing a different perspective than we see."

Many people abroad have heard about the backlash against Arab-Americans occurring in some areas of the United States and have become worried, Davis said.

So far, though, the Manhattan community has responded positively to Arab students, Davis said.

The Riley County Police Department and the K-State Police said they have not received any complaints of harassment from Arab residents.

In fact, Davis said, all the students who have left plan to return next semester.

"They care very much about their degree, and they like K-State," she said. "They all have every intention of coming back."

The American Council on Education reported that 40,000 students from the Middle East are studying in the United States. Nationwide, more than 100 of those students are reported to have returned home, including about 30 from the University of Missouri.

MU police said they have received four or five reports of harassment since

Officials continue to arrest links to al-Qaida terrorists

 BY KAREN GULLO
 The Associated Press

WASHINGTON, D.C. — Authorities have arrested 150 terrorist suspects linked to Osama bin Laden's network, President Bush said Thursday. Evidence emerged that one hijacker had taken part in earlier terror attacks against Americans.

Law enforcement officials, speaking on condition of anonymity, said there also was some evidence the hijackers and their collaborators went to lengths to make it difficult to track their Internet communications.

One official said the evidence indicated messages for various terrorism plans were disguised as innocent communications, in some cases using code language or pictures. The hijackers also used public

BSU to sponsor fashion show Saturday in Union

Music and fashion will come together at the first fashion show sponsored by the Black Student Union.

The fashion show will be at 7 p.m. Saturday in the K-State Student Union's Forum Hall.

The show will feature students modeling casual, business and formal wear. Admission to the show is $3 for BSU members and $5 for the general public.

Maurice Parks, president of BSU, said the event has taken a lot of time to organize, but he thinks students will enjoy watching other people model great clothes.

"People feel good when they look good," Parks said. "We wanted to make a fun event that students could use to update their styles and feel good about themselves."

Fort Riley begins allowing limited access into base

Fort Riley allowed limited access on its base for recreational activities starting Thursday.

"We have opened a small amount for hunting and fishing on the edge of the base," Christie Vanover, Fort Riley spokeswoman, said.

Increased security following the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks led to suspension of all recreational activity. However, the areas of the post where the hunting grounds are located are not closed down by security.

"At no time will the hunters and fishermen be allowed around buildings and personnel that are being kept secure," Vanover said.

Participants must register their weapons and obtain permits before being allowed onto the hunting grounds.

Constituent begins push to recall Sen. O'Connor

TOPEKA — An angry constituent has started an effort to recall a female legislator who was quoted as saying that women's suffrage was a sign that American society doesn't value families enough.

Ronda Hassig, 43, a middle school teacher in Lenexa, said she is organizing a campaign to remove state Sen. Kay O'Connor, R-Olathe, because she believes the senator is not representing many of her constituents. She said the grounds for a recall most likely would be incompetence.

O'Connor received national attention for her comments last week, which stated she did not view enactment of the 19th Amendment to the U.S. Constitution as an event to celebrate and that women would not feel the need to vote if men took care of them properly.

"As a constituent, if she doesn't think women should be voting, she shouldn't be in office," Hassig said.

After O'Connor made her remarks, Kansas Attorney General Carla Stovall, another Republican, said the senator should resign. Other legislators were stunned.

Russian-designed missile hits plane, causes crash

WASHINGTON, D.C. — A long-range

anti-aircraft missile fired during a military training exercise in Ukraine appears to have accidentally brought down a Russian airliner flying from Israel to Siberia, U.S. officials said Thursday. The plane, a chartered Russian Tupolev 154, crashed into the Black Sea with at least 76 aboard.

"This looks to be a military training exercise gone terribly awry," said one U.S. official, speaking on condition of anonymity. The Ukrainian Defense Ministry, however, denied any of its weapons could have hit a civilian aircraft.

The missile is believed to be an S-200, a surface-to-air missile of Russian design that is guided by radar to its target. NATO calls the missile the SA-5 "Gammon." It flies faster than three times the speed of sound, has a range of up to 185 miles and can hit targets above 100,000 feet altitude, according to several military open-source publications.

A U.S. official said the missile was fired from a land-based launcher in the Crimean region of Ukraine.

Anthrax hospitalization not linked to terrorism

TALLAHASSEE, Fla. — A 63-year-old businessman has been hospitalized in Florida with pulmonary anthrax, a highly lethal disease mentioned as a possible biological weapon.

U.S. Health Secretary Tommy Thompson said Thursday there is no evidence this case was a result of terrorism.

"This is an isolated case, and it's not contagious," Thompson said at a White House news conference.

He said such incidents are rare, very rare.

Anthrax has been developed by some countries as a possible biological weapon. But, the disease can be contracted naturally: the bacterial spores can be found in soil and often are carried by livestock. Officials said the Florida victim is an avid outdoorsman.

ASK THE FINANCIAL PLANNERS

Dear Financial Planners,

I was reading an article a couple of weeks ago about the need for renter's insurance, and I was wondering what I should look for?

Purchasing renter's insurance is a great idea. Renter's insurance not only can be used to replace lost or stolen property, but it also protects you if someone sues you for negligence.

Before purchasing renter's insurance you should ask your parents if you are covered under their policy. Some policies contain a clause that provides coverage for a dependent.

When purchasing renter's insurance, it is important to determine whether it uses a replacement cost method. This means that there is a loss, you will be paid what it would cost to replace the lost items.

Coverage for belongings covers personal belongings. It is usually a good idea to keep a brief inventory of these items. Liability provides coverage if someone sues you. For example, if your dog bit someone and they sued, liability would cover the cost of your defense.

Medical coverage pays for someone else's medical expenses. Using the previous scenario, you could be sued not only for the fact that your dog bit someone, but also for medical expenses. By the way, if you have roommates, you each need to obtain your own renter's insurance policies.

Cooler weather provides pleasant work atmosphere

BY AMBER KOEHN
Kansas State Collegian

With temperatures soaring well above 90 degrees for most of August, and humidity levels pushing those temperatures even further up the thermometer, the recent cold fronts have students taking advantage of the cooler weather.

Derek Settle, graduate student in plant pathology, said working outside in the greenhouses during cooler weather definitely is better than working outside in the fields in the heat.

"I had to do field research during the hottest part of the year, July and August," Settle said. "I made sure to wear plenty of sunscreen, drink a lot of fluids and take off as many clothes as I could without getting in trouble. Now that it's cooler, I can work in the greenhouses and do my research without suffering from the heat."

Settle said that just because the temperatures got cooler didn't mean he couldn't continue his research.

"I can continue to do research all year round, but I can only collect data when it's hot. That's when all of the plant diseases occur. When it cools off, there are no diseases, so I have to recreate the hotter conditions in the greenhouses," Settle said.

Settle said that with cooler temperatures, he's been able to get more work done compared to the amount completed on hotter days.

"It's a lot better when it's cooler out," he said. "The heat really takes it out of you. It's nice now with the cooler weather, because with my research, I had to take measurements in the peak of the heat, and I was getting to the point where I was looking forward to the temperature being 100 degrees instead of 105 degrees."

Casey Berner, sophomore in communications, also spends a lot of his time outdoors. Berner, who works as a groundskeeper for K-State, said the summer heat wasn't that bad when he planned his day ahead of time.

"I tried to get most of my work done in the morning when it wasn't so hot. If I couldn't do that, I would try to work in the shade and take frequent breaks," Berner said. "Our bosses knew it was hot and they didn't push us. They made sure we drank plenty of fluids and took it easy."

State climatologist Mary Knapp said temperatures weren't as hot this year compared to last year at this time.

"Students haven't realized that it was hotter on average last year than it was this year," she said. "In September last year at this time, we were still in the eighties and nineties, with the beginning part of the month in the one-hundreds."

Knapp said the average high temperature last year for the end of August, and the beginning of September was around 99 degrees. The average temperature this year was around 93 degrees, a six-degree difference. And, since 1890, Kansas has had 16 hotter summers than the one recorded this year.

"Overall, it really wasn't that hot," Knapp said. "I heard all these people saying, 'It's so hot outside,' and 'I can't believe how hot it is. When is it going to cool off?' when it was even hotter last year."

Community debates retention of Manhattan High School mascot

BY SARAH RICE
Kansas State Collegian

The effects of the Manhattan OgdenUSD 383 Board of Education decision to retain the high school's Indian mascot are being felt among students at Manhattan High School.

The Board voted to keep the mascot with a 4-3 vote Wednesday, which was being challenged for its racist implications toward American Indians.

Senior Amy Donnelly said she was pleased with the decision.

"I was very happy to hear the mascot was being kept," she said. "I feel it is very respected, and I'm proud to be a Manhattan High Indian."

Senior Sheena Nagaraja, however, felt the mascot should have been retired.

"I don't agree at all," she said. "I can't believe after all this they are keeping it. If it offends people, then there is no question at all."

Senior Addie Laue said she doesn't think American Indians should feel offended.

"What didn't offend people when they first started the mascot shouldn't offend people now," she said. "We have the mascot because Indians are a good thing, not to make fun of them."

Mary Beth Reese, MHS drug and alcohol prevention counselor, was frustrated with the Board of Education for their lack of courage in making the right decision.

"I am truly disappointed that they didn't have the conviction to vote to change the mascot," she said.

"because it is time to no longer use a mascot because they are a race of people."

Sophomore Josh Staab was happy with the way the vote went.

"I was for the decisions because it was in the eye of the beholder," he said. "I believe people who are wanting it to be changed are being misled. When you have tradition for that long you shouldn't change it."

School Resource Officer John Winkler said his personal choice would have been to retire the Indian mascot.

"Personally, I think it should have been retired," he said. "As a history student, I remember the line 'the vanquished are doomed to have history written by victors.'"

Junior Grant Parker, who has spoken in favor of retiring the mascot at numerous meetings, said he was more disappointed in the board members' reasons for their votes, rather than the actual outcome.

"It's not that they voted to retain the mascot that disappointed me," he said. "It's that some of the school board members paid more attention to getting re-elected rather than following their hearts."

Senior Hank Wilson hopes this issue will bring more attention to the way the mascot is treated.

"If the students and staff want to keep Indians as mascots, then we should show why we have it and give it respect," he said.

Wilson suggested seminars and discussion about American Indians,

A new K-State tradition will be unveiled at 3 p.m. on Wednesday, Oct. 10 at the K-State Student Union, room 212

There are many traditional ways to identify K-Staters. They proudly display the color purple and K-State logos on everything. Beginning this fall, there will be another way to identify K-Staters — the official Kansas State University class ring.

- ❑ The official K-State ring was designed based on input from K-State students. The design tells K-State's story and reflects the culture and traditions of K-State.
- ❑ The ring will be a great way to connect all K-Staters through a new tradition.
- ❑ Students will be required to have completed a certain number of hours to qualify to order a class ring — that's what makes it special — not just anyone can get the K-State class ring. You have to earn the right to wear it.

For more information call the K-State Alumni Association at 785-532-6260.

Driving while tired endangers yourself, others

It is safe to assume most people spend a significant amount of time in their cars.

Every time you get into a car as a passenger or a driver, you are responsible.

According to the National Sleep Foundation, one in five motorists admit to falling asleep behind the wheel in the last year.

While it might seem like a good idea to push home when you are tired, it might not be the best thing for you or for others. Drowsy driving can lead to accidents and even death.

People who drive exhausted typically have slower reaction time, impaired judgment and vision, increased moodiness and aggressive behavior, and more difficulty following road signs.

If road signs are not where they are supposed to be because of theft, bigger problems can occur.

According to the Riley County Police Department, 11 road signs were intentionally run over or knocked down last weekend. When signs are stolen, it makes it difficult to react, drowsy or otherwise.

Stealing road signs is irresponsible. While it may seem cool to have a stop or children crossing sign in your living room, removing those signs puts others in the hands of harm.

SEXequality

Campus poster creates questions about double standards

Have you ever noticed the bulletin boards around campus plastered with posters and fliers? They're in the K-State Student Union, hallways of buildings and even in classrooms.

There is a bulletin board in one of my classrooms.

One day, when I was distractedly looking around the room, I noticed a poster on a board.

The poster was an advertisement for a scholarship program sponsored by Honda. It wasn't the lure of free money that caught my attention, but rather, the words on the poster.

The poster said, "This award really isn't about women's equality. It's about women's superiority."

The poster was promoting the Honda-Broderick Cup and the Collegiate Woman Athlete of the Year award.

This poster is one example of the double standard of sexism we promote in our society.

Can you imagine the uproar if the poster would have said, "This award really isn't about men's equality. It's about men's superiority?"

I don't think that poster would have been allowed on campus if it had said men instead of women.

Because women historically have been an oppressed segment of the population, the poster has remained in my classroom since the beginning of the year.

I don't think it's right to say one sex is better than the other. I certainly don't think it's right to promote the superiority of one sex over another with advertisements around campus.

Sarah McCaffrey

Posters like these don't make people think women are equal to men. In fact, I think they have the opposite effect.

The fact that a poster like this has been allowed to hang in a university classroom shows women aren't considered equal to men. If they were, this poster never would have been printed.

As long as posters like this are prominently displayed in public areas, we're going to perpetuate the blight of sexism.

Many of us don't realize this double standard exists. It lies crouching beneath the threshold of our everyday perception like a beast waiting to pounce upon its prey.

Even when the beast rears its ugly head, most of us still don't recognize it. Take, for example, the girl power trend.

Those sassy Brits, the Spice Girls, were the living embodiment of girl power. Their music empowered a whole legion of young girls to believe they had the power to do anything boys could do.

Unfortunately, they also spawned an annoying trend in the retail market that caused anything vaguely related with the theme of girl power to fly off the shelves in record numbers.

Shirts emblazoned with phrases like "Girls rule and boys drool" became a common staple of the pop culture girl power movement.

What would happen if the Backstreet Boys or N'SYNC decided to start a boy power movement?

Would any retailer dare to sell a shirt that said "Boys rule and girls drool"?

I never felt like I was inferior to males when I was growing up. I never felt like I was superior either. I was taught that all people were equal regardless of their sex.

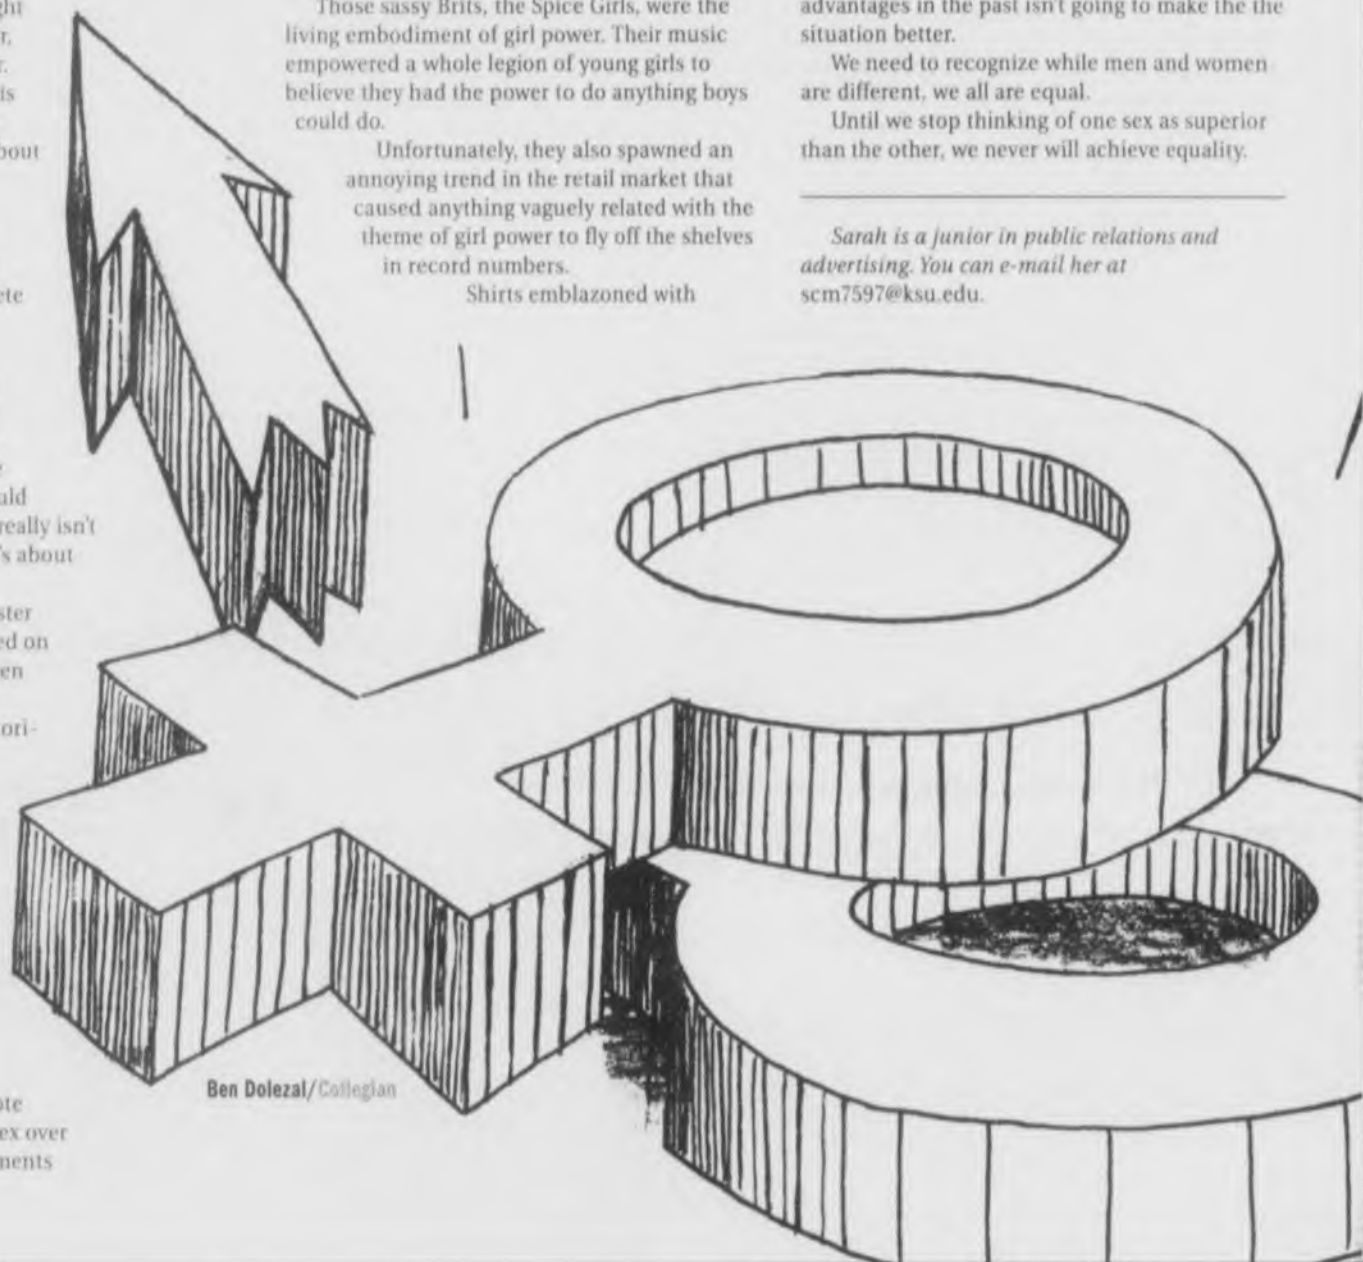

When I see posters like the Honda award poster or anything that promotes one sex over the other, I feel uncomfortable.

Promoting women as better than men just because we had fewer rights, opportunities and advantages in the past isn't going to make the situation better.

We need to recognize while men and women are different, we all are equal.

Until we stop thinking of one sex as superior than the other, we never will achieve equality.

Calculator usage poses problem for Honor Code

Ask any K-State student for an equation to calculate the first derivative of the Honor Code. Some might not be familiar with basic calculus and be confused. Some might wrinkle a brow, frown and begin a long-winded process of explanation.

However, some would turn directly to a calculator. After all, if any question mentions a mathematical process, a modern calculator can solve the problem. What does the Honor Code have to do with calculators?

Examine a modern calculator, and one will find a computer. When used in K-State's educational setting, these computers can have both positive and negative effects. Both effects stem from the huge amount of technology that's evolved over the past few decades.

Modern calculators free students from the ancient burden of using a slide rule.

What is a slide rule? Most Generation X students would think a slide rule might not be associated with math. They might believe it to be a rule in baseball to prevent injuries when a runner slides. Maybe they think it is a dance floor directive to clear the area when Longhorns plays the "Electric Slide."

In reality, a slide rule is an instrument that was required before the advent of calculators to figure logarithms.

The button "Log" on calculators replaced toiling for hours with a slide rule. With this function, calculators have been beneficial. They save time.

Saving time is the standard for which calculators are built. Engineers strive to find a calculator that is designed to do anything a human could.

In addition to basic mathematical operations, calculators have the ability to perform complex functions and the memory to save information. That's where the negative effects begin.

With calculators becoming do-it-all machines, two different problems arise. These two problems, though distinct, are intertwined. K-State needs to address both of these issues.

The first problem is, all students are not on a level playing field. Some cannot afford a $200 calculator to serve as a savior in math and science class. This is educational disparity. With enough money, students can buy a better grade.

A well-endowed student will have a better tool to conquer an exam. Attaining a better grade should not be tied to economic status.

The second problem is, students who have access to powerful calculators actually are learning less. Using a calculator to solve integrals in Calculus III doesn't teach a student anything but data entry.

Saving information into a calculator's memory for a chemistry or physics exam doesn't teach a student anything, but data entry, either.

Both forms of data entry border on cheating. There is no policy for these specific instances. K-State's Honor Code does an excellent job in defining plagiarism. However, it needs to deal with the technological advances of calculators. The policy now reads:

ACADEMIC DISHONESTY — FSM revised 2-15-94 Manual A Section 2 Article 1

Definition: In addition to plagiarism as defined above, various other forms of academic dishonesty occur which shall be subject to the penalties provided below (Section III). These include, but are not limited to, consultation of textbooks, library materials, or notes in examination where such materials are not to be used during the test; use of crib sheets or other hidden notes in such an examination...[KSU Honor Council Web site]

Is using a calculator's memory consulting a textbook, library materials or notes? Is using a calculator's memory counted as hidden notes? The code leaves this to the discretion of each course, in hopes that specifics will be outlined in the syllabus.

Syllabi are not specific on which functions can be performed with a calculator.

A huge gray area exists. Disparity will continue as long as those with TI-94s are allowed free roam.

We have found the solution to the first derivative of the Honor Code equation.

It is time for the Honor Code to give a uniform statement across campus about calculator use. Calculating honesty will become much easier.

Consistency. In any sport, as with golf, it is important to maintain a high level of consistency at every opportunity.

Consistency is exactly what the K-State men's golf team has exhibited so far this fall season.

The Cats fired their way to a third place overall finish at the Fairway Club Invitational in Lincoln, Neb., K-State's opening tournament.

K-State boasted a first-place showing in the Jim Colbert Intercollegiate tournament at Colbert Hills last Tuesday, and will be looking for more this morning at the Purina Classic in St. Charles, Mo.

Head coach Tim Norris said he expects continued success for his team at the classic.

"This is not a surprise," Norris said. "This is just a lot of hard work starting to come together. I do not think we are anywhere near where we can be potential-wise."

Senior Matt Williams and sophomore A.J. Elgert will look to put the Cats into contention in the 36 hole, two-day event.

Williams, the 2001 Kansas Amateur Champion, and Elgert, top-10 finisher in both of the Cats' tournaments this fall, will look to improve on a sixth-place showing at Colbert Hills.

Although there is potential for success, Norris said a positive showing at the Purina Classic will depend on K-State's ability to compete as a cohesive unit.

"It is a timing thing," he said. "You try to get three or four players performing well at the same time. We have not quite got that yet but we are obviously coming closer."

Along with timing, a strong rapport between teammates can work in a team's favor.

Sophomore Aaron Watkins said that potential question has developed into a distinct benefit for the Cats this season.

"We had great team unity last year," Watkins said. "We had a lot of newcomers this year and I was not sure how they were going to react to the rest of the team."

Watkins said that before too long, he had an answer to his question.

"Our team unity is three times what it was last year," he said.

"We feel very comfortable around each other and around each other's games. That helps in tournaments."

Little might be more conducive to unity than K-State's commitment to achieving its goals. Norris said that dedication to excellence is not something a coach can simply give to an athlete.

"Wednesdays are our days off," he said.

"I went out last Wednesday and saw six of my players golfing on their day off. It is a pride factor. You either have a good work ethic or you do not. My players do."

Although Norris' players are committed to excellence, it can't hurt that the Cats have a top-of-the-line facility to practice on as well. Norris said Colbert Hills has been an instrumental part of the golf team's success.

"Our facility is a real plus for the program," he said.

"After you play it, nothing else looks that rough. There is really no situation we cannot recreate at Colbert Hills."

A challenging course is beneficial, but for the Wildcats to stay consistent at the Purina Classic, and at tournaments throughout the year, nothing is more important than focus.

Watkins said his team's resolve is not one to be questioned.

"We all strive for excellence," he said. "We work on all aspects of the game, all the time."

Cats look for another road win in Boulder

BY LAURA BOYD
Kansas State Collegian

As K-State volleyball heads to Boulder, Colo., this Saturday, state feelings from an emotional week must be left behind, and the team's energy must come to life.

"We need to take a new approach with new energy," head coach Suzie Fritz said. "We need to be rested because we are all fatigued."

K-State might go into this weekend's match with a 5-9 record on the road against Colorado, but the Cats have beaten the Buffaloes in their last three outings in Boulder, making the rivalry even greater.

"All these girls know are the three wins," Fritz said. "We need to use that to our advantage this weekend."

Players and coaches agree that it always is tougher playing on the road. "We haven't played on the road in a while," senior Liz Wegner said. "We need to get on top in Colorado and create energy as a team."

Fritz said that playing in Colorado is a very different environment than playing at home.

"We have one of the best volleyball environments in the country," Fritz said.

"K-State fans are unbelievable, which makes playing at home that much easier."

A three-game sweep over intrastate rival Kansas on Wednesday helped the team create some of the energy needed for this weekend.

This, along with a day of rest and recuperation Thursday, might be just what the team needs to come out and play hard on Saturday.

Junior Jenny Pollard said she expects the team to come out and play well against Colorado.

"We know that KU beat CU, so we have a little more incentive to win," Pollard said. "It is kind of expected of us."

Pollard also said she finds the positives in this exhausting week and the matches against KU and Nebraska.

"When we are tired, we show our weaknesses," she said.

"We can look back on those and see what we need to improve on for the next game."

K-State volleyball players, freshmen Gabby Guerre (left) and Jami Slichte, reach for the ball during K-State's victory over the University of Kansas earlier this week.

Despite some overconfidence from the team, Fritz is focused on keeping the team together and playing tough against CU.

"We are in a tough conference," Fritz said. "No team can be overlooked."

A win this weekend will bring the No. 25-ranked Wildcats to 8-4 for the season.

"As long as we focus on staying in the system and keep our passes and serves strong, we can beat CU," Pollard said.

Fans' skills to be tested in Campus Tour at KSU Stadium

KSU Stadium will play host to the "NCAA Football Skills & Drills Campus Tour" on Saturday before the K-State vs. Colorado game.

The seven-city event will be located in the Stadium's East Parking Lot, and fans of all ages are invited to attend the free event from 8 to 11 a.m.

Events include an obstacle course, resistance run, a quarterback skills event, and a pass catching drill.

In addition to K-State, the tour will travel to home games at Alabama, Northwestern, Oklahoma, Penn State, Texas and Virginia Tech this year.

Women's tennis team traveling to play Riviera championships

K-State's women's tennis team will travel to Pacific Palisades, Calif., on Saturday for the Intercollegiate Tennis Association's Riviera Women's All-American Championships.

The tournament field includes returning NCAA All-Americans and at least one player from each of the ITA's regions.

Wildcats Alena Jecminkova, Kathy Chuda and Petra Sedlmajerova will represent K-State the tournament. In addition, Sedlmajerova and Chuda will pair up to compete in doubles action this weekend.

"We are always excited to go to the Riviera," K-State head coach Steve Bietau said.

"Next to the NCAA Championship, it is the biggest event of the year. The competition is great, and the atmosphere is out of this world."

K-State freshman expected to miss beginning of season

Marcus Hayes, a guard on the K-State men's basketball team, is expected to miss four to six weeks of action after breaking the fifth metatarsal bone in his right foot during Monday's workout session.

"We are disappointed to lose Marcus for such an extended period of time," head coach Jim Wooldridge said.

"He had worked hard throughout the summer to get ready for the season, and I know he is disappointed to miss this much practice time. We hope, through Marcus' diligent work ethic and that of our training staff, that he will be back on the court before too long."

Hayes was a first-team 6A All-State selection by the Florida High School coaches and a second-team All-State selection for the Florida Sportswriters Association as a senior.

Practice for the 2001-02 season begins Oct. 13, and the Cats' first game of the year is scheduled for Nov. 16 vs. Troy State.

FOOTBALL WEEKEND PREVIEW

COLORADO 3-1, 1-0
K-STATE (13) 2-1, 0-1

Colorado has won three straight games since falling to Fresno State at home in its season opener. K-State is looking to bounce back after suffering a loss at Oklahoma last weekend.

BAYLOR 2-1, 0-1
TEXAS A&M (22) 4-0, 1-0

Texas A&M will be looking for its third 5-0 start under head coach R.C. Slocum against Baylor who was shut out, 41-0, last weekend by Iowa State. The Aggies surrendered just three points last weekend against Notre Dame.

OKLAHOMA (3) 4-0, 1-0
TEXAS (5) 4-0, 1-0

Both the Sooners and Longhorns will be looking to make a statement Saturday afternoon in Austin, Texas. Texas is 4-0 for the first time since 1983 and will be looking to avenge last season's 63-14 loss to Oklahoma.

IOWA STATE 3-0, 1-0
NEBRASKA 5-0, 1-0

The Huskers will be looking for their ninth straight victory over the Cyclones in Lincoln, Neb., this weekend. Iowa State has posted shutouts in two of its first three games and has won 12 of its last 15 games.

MISSOURI 1-2, 0-1
OKLAHOMA STATE 2-2, 0-1

Missouri quarterback Kirk Farmer will start for the second time this season in Stillwater, Okla., after recovering from a preseason hand injury.

KANSAS 1-2, 0-1
TEXAS TECH 2-1, 0-1

Texas Tech's high-powered offense could have a big day thanks to Jayhawk defensive tackle Ervin Holloman's absence. The KU defensive star will miss the game to be with family after his mother's death.

SGA allots club funds

BY ALYSON RALETZ
Kansas State Collegian

Student Senators unanimously passed two bills at Thursday night's meeting to help K-State clubs attend conferences.

Senators allocated $1,000 to the Hispanic American Leadership Organization to reimburse members that attended a leadership conference.

The KSU Aikido organization also received $400 for members to attend an aikido seminar.

In other action, Attorney General Tara Hull presented a resolution with the final selections of Judicial Board member appointments. These are positions on Judicial Council, Student Tribunal, Student Review Board and the Parking Citation Appeals Board.

These students will represent residence hall and greek living groups, off-campus and students at-large.

Dillons opens gas station at eastside location

BY ALYSON RALETZ
Kansas State Collegian

Continuing a U.S. trend, the Dillons located near Fort Riley Boulevard opened an on-site gas station Tuesday morning.

"Picking up groceries and getting gas are the two most frequent errands for Americans," said Dennis Gaschler, Dillons spokesman in Hutchinson, Kan. "We feel this filler station ties in with our one-stop shopping experience."

Besides groceries, the gas station is a useful addition to Dillons one-stop shopping, which features a video store and mail and banking services, Gaschler said.

The Manhattan store is the 11th Dillons to have gas on-site. He said Dillons is considering adding a station to every location based on the area's space constraints and city regulations. However, he said, there will not be a filler station put in the Dillons at Westloop Shopping Center because there is no room for one.

The station will offer competitive prices, he said, along with a Dillons Plus card discount. With the card, customers receive two, four and six cent discounts off of the posted prices.

Mary Euston, senior in anthropology, filled up her car with a tank of gas after she shopped at Dillons Wednesday afternoon, and planned to try it out since she had seen the site under construction for several weeks.

"I usually shop at Texaco, but this is cheap," Euston said. "It's convenient since I was already here."

She said that as long as the gas stays cheap and she continues to get the two-cent discount for unleaded gasoline with her Dillons card, she will continue purchasing gas after shopping in the grocery store.

Brian Andrews, fuel manager for Dillons, said 27 percent of all fuel is sold at a grocery store or high-volume dealer such as a discount store. In the next five years, Dillons officials predicts this amount will rise to 15 percent, Andrews said.

"We are taking this on aggressively because there is going to be a change in the fuel market," he said. "It's a new trend in the industry."

He said that since filler stations complement large volume dealers, like grocery stores so well, other venues are experimenting with the addition.

"The attractiveness from a business perspective is realizing there will be more sales on the property you own. Our goal is to move those sales inside to the main store."

Wal-Mart has 400 gas stations located at its stores nationwide. The company has been adding the fuel sites to its stores since 1997.

According to city waterline regulations, the proposed Super Wal-Mart, which would be located north of the current Wal-Mart site, would not be able to add a filler station since it is so close to a well line.

Mike Shepherd/Collegian

Dillons is following a national trend by placing filling stations in its parking lot near Fort Riley Boulevard. The station will offer competitive prices.

Nevertheless, Wal-Mart representatives still are working with the city so they can provide the feature.

John Bisio, Wal-Mart communications affairs manager, said the filler stations have been successful nationwide because people are trying to simplify their lives as much as possible.

"People head to Wal-Mart and wonder, 'Is there anything I need to pick up on my way home?'" Bisio said. "Then, they see the gas station and realize that while they are there, they might as well fill up."

He said it is a customer-enhancing shopping experience.

"Of course, it also works the other way," he said. "People come in to buy gas and realize they need to run in and pick up some last-minute items."

MIDDLE EAST

the attacks. The threats range from telephone calls to direct encounters.

One MU medical student reported receiving a threatening e-mail: "I'm happy to see the world turn against the Arab pigs of the world. We will kill you all."

Though there have been rumors that the United Arab Emirates Embassy in Washington, D.C., has been encouraging students to go home, Abdullah Alsaboosi, representative for the embassy, said no such advice has been given.

"Some students don't feel very comfortable. People have been hostile," he said. "They say they want to go back home, and we tell them, 'it is in your hands.'"

Alsaboosi said whether students stay or leave often depends on where they are studying.

"If their community has experienced a high percentage of hate crimes because of origin or color, they're more likely to leave," he said.

In Manhattan, Davis said the International Student Office continues to keep in close contact with its foreign students.

"We're in pretty regular contact with everybody," she said. "We're trying very hard to protect our Middle Eastern students."

locations like libraries and hotels to access the Internet, making it difficult to track their whereabouts or identities, the officials said.

Several Internet providers here and abroad have received subpoenas and turned over information about the communications.

ABC News quoted French officials Thursday as saying one man they arrested had information in a notebook about how the terrorists disguised their messages.

The new information emerged as the FBI released new photos and details about the last hours two hijackers spent in Maine before flying to Boston to commandeer a jetliner.

Authorities also investigated a case of anthrax in Florida that was not believed to involve terrorism.

Bush said U.S. and overseas authorities have rounded up 150 people believed to be part of bin Laden's al-Qaida network. Bin Laden, a fugitive Saudi millionaire, is the prime suspect in the attacks on New York and Washington.

An additional 50 suspected terrorists not connected to al-Qaida also have been arrested, officials said.

The British government, meanwhile, said at least three of the 19 suspected hijackers had links to al-Qaida and one had played a key role in the bombings of two U.S. embassies in Africa and the USS Cole.

Bin Laden was indicted in the United States for the embassy bombings and is suspected of masterminding the USS Cole attack.

The British report released by Prime Minister Tony Blair did not name the hijackers. The Associated Press has reported that two suspected hijackers, Khalid Almihdhar and Nawaf Alhazmi, met in January 2000 with a bin Laden associate believed to be involved in the Cole attack.

The British report also said a senior bin Laden associate oversaw the planning of the Sept. 11 attacks.

U.S. officials have told the AP of evidence involving at least one bin Laden associate. They said Mohamed Atta, suspected of flying one of the planes that crashed in New York, wired money to a man named Mutafeh Ahmend, who is believed to be Shayk Saïd, bin Laden's top money man.

Federal documents sent to banks in recent days have used the names Saïd and Ahmed interchangeably.

In Maine, the FBI released photos of Atta and Abdulaziz Alomari taken from surveillance videos at an ATM, a gas station and a Wal-Mart just hours before they boarded a commuter flight in Portland. Their flight linked up with one of the jetliners that crashed into the World Trade Center.

The FBI hoped the photos would generate tips from Portland residents who might have seen the two men, who were in town the night before the attacks.

In other developments: —A Saudi pilot has been released on bond three weeks after being taken into custody at Kennedy International Airport. Abdulaziz M. Alangari, who flies with Saudi Arabian Airlines, was arrested Sept. 13 on a material witness warrant. A lawyer for the Saudi embassy said authorities don't think Alangari is involved in the attacks.

—A man suspected of being involved in the plot was arrested in Mauritania. Mouhamedou Ould Slahi had been under surveillance in Canada for suspected links to the foiled millennium attacks.

—Maryland authorities sent the FBI a list of 212 arrested or suspected cigarette smugglers to investigate whether any might have engaged in the activities to help raise money for terrorist activities.

Bonds ties McGwire's home run record

BY BEN WALKER

The Associated Press

HOUSTON — Barry Bonds hit home run No. 70 Thursday night and tied Mark McGwire's record — a feat even Big Mac thought might last a lifetime when he did it a mere three years ago.

Bonds, son of an All-Star and godson of a home run king, has three games left to make history all his own.

Bonds, who watched Houston pitchers work around him throughout the three-game series, finally got a chance to swing in the ninth inning. He did not miss, hitting a 454-foot shot into the upper deck in right field off rookie Wilfredo Rodriguez.

The Giants won 10-2, completing a three-game sweep that kept them two games behind Arizona in the NL West race with three games remaining, all against Los Angeles.

Bonds immediately raised both arms in the air as he began a slow trot around the bases. The record crowd of 43,734, which had booed when Astros pitchers walked him, rewarded him with a standing ovation.

His San Francisco teammates poured out to greet a smiling Bonds at home plate along with Bonds' son, Nikolai. Bonds pointed at his family behind the third-base dugout as he returned to the bench.

"Everybody was telling me just be patient, be patient. I'm glad it's over. I'm glad my family was here. My wife gets to sleep now," Bonds said.

He said he was honored to share the record with McGwire. "He's a great baseball player," Bonds said.

With fans still cheering at Enron Field, he came out for two curtain calls. Bonds took his position in left field to start the bottom of the ninth, was mobbed by teammates who were in the Giants bullpen, then was replaced and left waving his cap.

"I got frustrated when it was 8-1 and they intentionally walked me because it was not a really crucial situation. That's when I got really frustrated," Bonds said.

Bonds' 70th homer marked the second big achievement of the day in the majors. Earlier, Rickey Henderson of San Diego scored his 2,246th career run and broke Ty Cobb's record.

doctoral degree in economics. "Afghanistan is one of the poorest countries in the world."

Women are not allowed to work by order of the Taliban, reducing the possibility of increased income. They sit along the roads, beside their dwellings begging for food or money.

The only roads are made of dirt because the country has no infrastructure.

"The infrastructure is very bad. They don't have roads. They don't have airports — they don't even have phones. They have nothing," Al-Omar said.

The number of communication lines are very limited, and the ones that do exist are almost all in the same city.

"It's a hard living," El-Hodiri said. He said the Taliban sees the conditions of the country, but it does not care.

"They are awful people," he said. "They aren't just awful to us, they're awful to their own people."

"Most Afghans would wage a fight against the Taliban if they could."

The Taliban takes much of the money the economy produces.

"You can see the Taliban doesn't care about the people, and that's the dilemma," said Svetla Dobrinova, graduate student in political science.

"If the Taliban is Islamic, words don't match reality," she said.

Iran

To put it simply, "There are the oil-rich countries and the not so oil-rich," El-Hodiri said.

Iran is one of the oil-rich. However, 53 percent of the population lives below the poverty line.

This is because the wealth is not allocated to the entire country. It is kept in the hands of the country's elite.

"In general, if there is oil, it doesn't go to benefit the man or woman on the street," El-Hodiri said.

Therefore, the majority of the country lives in poverty.

U.S. foreign aid is not given to the country because it is one of the five "rogue states."

All trade is prohibited with these countries, including Iran, Iraq, North Korea, Cuba and Libya.

"Their economies are kind of stagnant because of the restrictions from the outside," Dobrinova said.

These states, or outlaw states, are deemed so based on three characteristics: the pursuit of weapons of mass destruction, the use of terrorism as an instrument of state policy and regional threat to important U.S. interests.

The first list of rogue states was implemented in 1979, but they were called pariah states. Though the United States is the only country with such a policy, Dobrinova said it isn't just the United States that follows it.

"Their economy is very much affected by this," Dobrinova said. "The U.S. expects its allies to do the same, and if they don't, then they are not agreeing with the U.S."

The policy can cause illegal activity within the countries, she said, because it is a way to make money and a living.

Iran has remained a key transshipment point for Southwest Asian heroin to Europe.

Dobrinova said such an economic situation can cause terrorist activities to arise.

Pakistan

Poor and heavily populated, the Pakistani economy relies on foreign loans and grants to survive, that, combined with little agriculture and industry.

"Pakistan could do very well, but they've been fighting with each other and fighting with Israel," El-Hodiri said.

Internal and external political disputes have greatly affected Pakistan's economy and living conditions.

Of the government's revenue, 25 percent of it is derived from foreign loans and grants.

Their external debt by 1999 estimates totals $32 million.

Thirty-four percent of the population is below the poverty line.

However, due to the influx of Afghan refugees, many countries are giving Pakistan funding to support them.

Al-Omar said the refugees might have a negative effect on the country at first, but only initially.

With Pakistan's population at around 140 million, an influx of even

3 million refugees will not affect the economy that greatly, he said. And in this case, because countries are giving Pakistan money, they actually help the country.

"So sometimes, it will benefit Pakistan — not hurt Pakistan," Al-Omar said. The country has most always been assisted by the United States.

Though the economies in Pakistan and Afghanistan differ, they are similar in one aspect: they both contain the Taliban.

How does this affect the Pakistan economy?

"I believe the answer is it does not promote the economy, but it uses it for its own business," Dobrinova said. "The regime is like a cancer for the economy."

Israel

Conditions in Israel are worlds apart from other Middle Eastern countries, even though geographically, it's in the same region.

"Israel is a completely different story — you can't even compare the economical level," Dobrinova said.

Israel is the only democratic country in the area. It has something similar to the U.S. constitution, as well as a system similar to the United States' system of checks and balances, and a formal government.

It ranks 26th in the world for its income per capita. At $19,000, it's higher than that of Spain and Italy.

Why has Israel done so well? "From the very beginning, in 1948, when Israel was established, its foundation was based on very democratic principles," Dobrinova said.

The system of checks and balances, and the representation in the government contribute to the country's success, Dobrinova said.

She said the spectrum of people in government is vast.

"Many areas of interest are represented," she said.

This is quite opposite of countries such as Afghanistan where the people are not represented at all.

Israel, like Pakistan, receives economic aid from the United States, along with military aid.

Roughly half of Israel's external debt is owed to the U.S.

Though Israel's statistics look good, Basel Saleh, who's obtaining a doctoral degree in economics, said there is another side to the story.

"There is a very sad side to this story," he said.

Saleh said the country's economic development has been accompanied by an increase in income inequality within the Jewish population and between the Jewish Arab citizens.

He also said discriminatory violence and violence against women persist.

"The government made little in reducing institutionalized legal and society discrimination against Israel's Christian, Muslim and Druz citizens," he said. "And trafficking in women for the purpose of forced prostitution is a continuing problem."

Saleh said it is important to realize the Israeli statistics do not include those of its occupied territories. The conditions in those areas, he said, are much worse.

Nonetheless, Israel remains one of the most moderate countries in the Middle East and surrounding areas.

"There is something that separates them from the rest of the countries," Dobrinova said. "They are different. They have different systems, a different way of functioning, different beliefs — different everything."

study in college, all I really knew was that I wanted to go to K-State," Watkins said. "I'm really glad I did make the trip to Salina to see what was offered there, also. The experience and opportunities that I had at K-State-Salina may not have been there for me in Manhattan."

That is one reason K-State opened its doors in Salina, Kuhlman said.

"K-State Salina has provided the opportunity for students to pursue their academic goals in a small college atmosphere that is part of a major land-grant institution," he said.

The campuses are bonded by an Interstate 70 connection, but that is not the only road that has led to K-State-Salina's success.

"The pride in K-State and mutual desire for excellence are uniform from campus to campus," Watkins said. "This has been successful because of the great leadership of President Wefald and the administration on the Salina campus to implement the Kansas State University vision."

The Salina campus truly is a part of the K-State family, Delker said.

"I feel very connected as a member of the K-State family. I enjoy my involvement with colleagues in other departments of the university, and I feel that my involvement with faculty senate and other university-wide committees have kept those connections strong."

"Our administrative structure, policies and procedures are common on both campuses. So is our preference for the color purple," Delker said.

Renowned classical musician will perform Sunday at McCain

BY JOE ELKINTON
Kansas State Collegian

Performing for the first time at K-State, Markus Groh, one of the world's most renowned and talented concert pianists, will bring his unique blend of poetry and power at 7 p.m. Sunday, to McCain Auditorium.

Groh is only the third performer in the last three years to perform a sonata by Frederic Chopin at McCain Auditorium. Richard Martin, director of McCain, said it was the third and final sonata written by the composer. The sonata is one of Chopin's most prominent pieces.

and is titled "The Funeral March," he said.

Although the pianist is not known by many people in the area, Groh should still impress the audience, Martin said. The fact that the pieces are recognizable by audiences gives the performance added appeal, Martin said.

"We try to get unusual work, not cookie-cutter pieces," he said. "However, if you're trying to attract the attention of the audience, you can't give them something they can't recognize; they want something they know."

One hour prior to the performance, there will be a lecture in 204 McCain, given by Dr. Virginia

Houser, associate professor of music. Free to the public, the lecture is designed to introduce classical music to those not accustomed to the genre, said Thom Jackson, marketing and development officer for McCain.

Martin said Houser's lecture might help people get into the performance.

"She will discuss the importance of the pieces in Groh's repertoire and how to help people listen for what will make the performance more enjoyable," Martin said.

Groh studied music at the German Stuttgart Conservatory, the Berlin Academy of the Arts and the Salzburg Mozarteum. In 1995, Groh achieved acclaim as a new generation pianist by winning the Queen Elisabeth Competition, the first German in the competition's history to win the award.

Preceding the concert at K-State, Groh has performed with many international symphonies, as well as a recital tour along the main venues of many European cities.

Jackson said he is looking forward to the concert.

"I think it's going to be an interesting performance," he said. "It will be out of the normal box, but it is up to usual, standard quality."

Fair to donate proceeds to United Way

Little Apple Fair

■ 1-10 p.m. Sunday at Cic Park, located at the corner of Kimball and Avery Avenue.
■ Admission is $10 at the gate
■ Interested in setting up information booth? Contact Megan Rickel at 776-0654.
■ 13 acts are scheduled to appear: United Black Voices Gospel Choir, Sabbath Rest, Jennie Dieball, David Richard, Pins and Needles, Condition 13, The B.A.s, Flybox, Towni Freeland 4, Sharkey's Little Groove Box, Ruskabank, Pomeroy, Kristie Stremel

The charity Rickel selected to receive the funds is the United Way.

"The United Way has so many subsidiaries," Rickel said. "I figured this was the best way to get the most amount of money to the most amount of people."

When tragedy struck America on Sept. 11, Rickel said she knew she also wanted to help in that recovery process.

"I talked with Aileen, whom I'd already been working with at the United Way, on Sept. 11," she said. "We decided that half of the money should go to disaster relief funds on the East Coast."

The other half of the money will stay with the United Way in Riley County. Aileen Cray, executive director of the United Way, said she appreciates Rickel's efforts.

"She's worked really hard to put this day together," Cray said. "It was an idea, and now she's doing it. We think this will be a great opportunity to introduce students to the United Way."

There will be information booths for students to visit Sunday, Cray said.

"United Way alone has 13 agencies, including such groups as the Red Cross and the Salvation Army," she said. "There are so many ways to get involved. We welcome many forms of help."

Help has gotten the concert to where it is, Rickel said.

"I got so many lucky breaks in contacting generous people," Rickel said. "Everything from the bands to StagePro in Lawrence."

The concert will consist of 13 bands and musicians playing everything from country to metal.

Sabbath Rest is one band that will be onstage Sunday. Guitarist and vocalist Jeremy Robbins, senior in broadcast journalism, said the band's style is hard to explain.

"The best way I can describe it is groove-rock," Robbins said. "We do a lot of jams. It's not pop music, but it is ear candy. It will make you sit up and pay attention."

While some people have considered

Sabbath Rest a Christian band, Robbins said he doesn't necessarily agree with that classification.

"There are automatic connotations associated with Christian rock," he said. "We just happen to all be Christians and musicians. The two can go together."

Sabbath Rest agreed to play the concert because it wanted to help a good cause, Robbins said.

"It sounded like a good deal when Megan told us about it," he said. "The whole point of doing anything is to benefit everyone else."

Bobby T's Bar & Deli is participating in the benefit, too.

"We'll give our $2 cover charge over to United Way for people that went to the Apple Fair," manager Greg Bollenbach said. "We figured it's a little something we could do to help."

The bar will have a DJ and drink specials Sunday night.

Students can bring everything but food and alcohol to the concert. A barbecue vendor will be at the park.

Those wanting to volunteer can show up at 5:30 p.m. Sunday to help set up the stage, Rickel said. They also can stay afterward Sunday to help clean up. Anyone volunteering will get free admittance to the concert, or will be refunded when it's over.

Absence of stop sign causes early morning accident

DANA STRONGIN
Kansas State Collegian

A car accident on the intersection of 17th and Laramie streets Wednesday morning raised the issue of stolen and vandalized traffic control devices.

The accident occurred between two vehicles at approximately 2:20 a.m., according to the Riley County Police Department's official report. A stop sign and its post were missing from the northeast corner that controlled westbound traffic.

Both drivers said they did not see the other car until it was too late, according to the report. One driver, a resident of Salina, said she was not very familiar with the area. The accident caused her to run over a stop sign on the south-west curb.

This accident points to a significant problem in the local area, said Chuck Williams, assistant director of public works for the City of Manhattan. Williams oversees the installation and maintenance of street signs in the area.

"Just over the weekend, 11 signs were intentionally run over or knocked down," he said.

Williams said the damages from these actions add up to $12,000 - $15,000 per year.

Monetary costs are only part of the effects of stealing or changing signs, Williams said.

"Those that are stealing and vandalizing need to understand the potential danger that they are creating," he said. "Kids think it is a cute thing to do, but it is a serious problem."

Williams said a school zone flasher was stolen on College Heights Road recently. He said those responsible were probably not thinking about the danger they were creating for children.

There are even worse effects, Williams said, than creating the chance that someone will get hurt. Sometimes people really do get injured or killed as a result of these actions.

"We have a video of an incident in Florida in which the perpetrators were caught on video," he said. "Because they stole a stop sign, people were killed in an accident. The perpetrators were convicted of manslaughter and sentenced to several years in prison."

Williams said the city is willing to come to any campus organization and show the video as an example of the dangers and potential consequences of altering traffic control devices.

The city tried using special bolts on signs that required a specific wrench, Williams said, but then people started stealing the entire posts.

"I can't believe people think this is fun," he said.

Williams said he could not say who was most responsible for stealing and vandalizing signs. He did say the evidence points more toward college students.

"Considering the time of night at which the incidents usually occur, I suspect college students hold more responsibility," he said.

Williams said the city aims to get its signs back.

"If somebody wanted to call, I don't care what they claim their reasons for having signs are. We will come and get the signs," he said. "But if people are found with signs, we will prosecute them by the fullest extent of the law."

There are serious repercussions for stealing traffic control devices, said Capt. John Doebling, patrol commander for the Riley County Police Department.

"If we catch people in the act of stealing a sign, which we often do, we will give them a notice to appear in court, and we may arrest them," he said. "They will be fined, and there is the chance of getting time in jail."

Doebling said they often catch people in possession of signs when they are searching an area on a warrant.

"If we find a sign, we will notify the owner, who may act," he said. "We may cite them or arrest them for theft."

It is hard to identify the perpetrator when the sign is in a greek house or other high-occupancy residence, Doebling said.

Repercussions can be both in criminal and civil court, depending upon the circumstances, Doebling said. He said those who stole the stop sign at 17th and Laramie, if known, could be charged.

There is another side to the issue, Doebling said. He wants drivers to remember to use caution.

"At an uncontrolled intersection, drivers have an obligation to make sure their path is clear before proceeding," he said. "They can't make assumptions about other drivers."

Some signs are more popular than others, Doebling said. He said street signs that have names on them often are stolen.

Williams said he cannot emphasize enough the issues importance.

"We want everyone to know that we are taking this seriously, and that the public needs to take it seriously too," Williams said.

Lack of sleep can cause problems on road

ELIZABETH GRAHAM
Kansas State Collegian

One in five motorists admits to having fallen asleep at the wheel in the last year, according to the National Sleep Foundation, a nonprofit organization that promotes education and research on sleep and its disorders.

The National Highway Traffic Safety Administration estimates drowsy drivers cause 100,000 crashes each year that result in more than 1,500 deaths and 71,000 injuries. By comparison, 16,653 people were killed last year in alcohol-related crashes.

Brandy Bruna, senior in elementary education, said she thinks driving while tired is a problem, even for K-State students.

"It can affect anyone—not only the person driving, but also friends, family and others—whether it be the person driving while they were tired or the person killed or injured," she said.

Megan Ebert, senior in interior architecture, also said he thinks this is a problem for students.

"A lot of times, students are more tired than they realize which can create problems," Ebert said.

The foundation survey found that half of the respondents admitted they drove when they were tired during the last year, and 20 percent said they had fallen asleep at the wheel.

Men were more apt to drive while drowsy (59 percent to 47 percent for women), with young men—those 18 to 29—most likely to drive drowsy at 65 percent.

Ebert said she is likely to drive when she is tired out of necessity.

"When it's crunch time to get a project complete for studio, you don't take the time to worry about such things. You just keep working. When you're exhausted to the point where you can't remember the thought you had five seconds ago, you leave studio—and most likely get in your car and drive home," she said.

Bruna said she has driven while she was tired just because she wanted to get to where she was going. Usually, if it is something she can wait on, she doesn't drive, she said.

Studies show that drowsy drivers have slower reaction time, impaired judgment and vision, increased moodiness and aggressive behavior, and more difficulty following road signs.

According to the NSF, drivers might need to stop and rest if they can't remember the last few miles driven, drift from their lanes or hit rumble strips, experience wandering or disconnected thoughts, yawn repeatedly, have difficulty focusing or keeping their eyes open, tailgate or miss traffic signs, have trouble keeping their head up, or keep jerking their vehicles back into the lane.

Bruna said the obvious precaution is to not drive when tired. But she has known people who call someone on their cell phone, roll down the window, turn up the radio, or pull over and take a 10 minute nap to stay alert.

To stay awake, Ebert drinks caffeinated beverages, eats something like peanuts or M&M's one piece at a time, drives with the windows down, runs the air conditioner and sings.

"I have gotten to the point that I know when I'm tired when driving, so I have tricks to keep me awake," Ebert said.

Relevant Experience And Learning

R.E.A.Lity Check

R.E.A.L. stands for Relevant Experience and Experiential Learning. This Experiential Learning program is coordinated by CES to assist students in locating and documenting intern, co-op, summer, and/or volunteer experiences.

How did you find your internship?

I found my internship through reading the two books John Walsh wrote about his kidnapped and abducted son Adam Walsh. Mr. Walsh helped in establishing the center as a resource to parents, law enforcement officials and others to help find missing and exploited children.

What were your day-to-day responsibilities?

Originally I started my internship as a case manager assistant. I handled cases of missing children right from the beginning of my internship. Mostly the cases I had were endangered runaways, but some were cases of child prostitution and some were Internet related. I took information from parents and law enforcement officials aside from doing a little work here at the center to aid the assigned agency of the missing child.

What did you learn from your internship?

This internship really widened my eyes to reality. We really are shielded from it quite often and this experience showed me what is all out there.

Any brushes with fame or fortune?

Starting in September, because of the contacts I made here, I probably will start working part-time on the hotline of America's Most Wanted. Also celebrities are common in visiting here. We have FBI and Secret Service agents stationed here because of the information the government has trusted us with in our facility.

What advice would you offer other students seeking an internship experience?

Without a doubt, do an internship. This not only lets people experience your work ethic, but it allows them to know who they are going to be hiring without taking many risks. Your chances of getting hired by an agency are I would say 99% better if you have done an internship with them or they know who you are very well.

Most likely to succeed.

This in-car satellite navigation system from GARMIN is helping people go places. Just as impressive as the technology is the fact that several of the engineers who brought this sophisticated product to market are recent K-State grads. As recent as the class of '99, to be exact. Talk about putting your career on the fast track.

At GARMIN, you'll have a chance to jump in day one and start contributing to product development. We're not talking about designing a single circuit that's part of some bigger project you'll never see. We're talking hands-on engineering here — designing, manufacturing and testing real products. Like the StreetPilot III. How would you like to write the software or design the hardware for such a high-tech product, then see it advertised on CNN and sold in Comp USA stores? For the K-Staters who did just that, it was the perfect opportunity. And it happens every day at GARMIN.

Our engineers design some of the world's leading consumer electronics and GPS (Global Positioning System) products used by pilots, hikers, bikers, boaters, fishing enthusiasts and travelers. If you have a passion for any of these pursuits, all the better. You'll get to develop, test and use products of your own design while working alongside some of the best and brightest engineers in the field.

GARMIN's newly expanded facility is located in Olathe — a growing suburban area just 30 minutes from downtown Kansas City. Forget traffic jams and fighting for a parking spot. Think green space, blue sky and a reverse commute.

And you still have access to big city entertainment, pro sports teams and exceptional schools and universities.

The StreetPilot III made a splash at this year's International Consumer Electronics Show (CES) in Las Vegas, and earned a spot in the Innovations 2001 Design and Engineering Showcase.

REGROUP & RECOVER

Zach Long/Collegian

Quarterback Eli Roberson's last-chance pass, intended for wide receiver Aaron Lockett, is broken up by a trio of Oklahoma defensive backs. The Sooners edged out the Wildcats last week, 38-37, despite Roberson's career passing day. K-State will look to bounce back this weekend against Colorado.

Hangover effect not expected after loss to Oklahoma

BY DEREK BOSS
Kansas State Collegian

Oct. 21, 2000.
A close loss to Oklahoma at KSU Stadium nearly snowballed into two defeats for the Wildcats this cloudy evening.

Though it might be hard to forget the Sooners' stunning 41-31 victory over the then-No. 2 Cats last year — in which dropped passes, missed tackles and crucial penalties plagued the purple, K-State fans might not remember the outcome of the very next game on the Cats' schedule.

It was All-University Homecoming at KSU Stadium, and K-State squeaked by Texas Tech, 28-23.

The memories of that day haven't escaped the minds of the team, though, free safety Jon McGraw said. And after losing to Oklahoma again this season — 38-37 last weekend — he said he hopes the Cats (2-1, 0-1) come out against Colorado (3-1, 1-0) on Saturday with a different attitude than the one displayed toward the Red Raiders last fall.

Otherwise, it will be much of the same result, he said — or worse.

"Hopefully, the guys are understanding that you can't let a game affect you like that," McGraw said. "I think the biggest motivating factor is just imagining what it would be like if we did lose — imagine what it would've been like if we had lost to Texas Tech last year."

"So, that's enough motivation for me and, I think, most of the guys on the team to do whatever it takes to get over last week and get focused on the task this week."

Yet, the circumstances are different from last year when looking at the stage of each particular season. Last year's loss to the Sooners came in game seven, whereas last Saturday's defeat was only the third game for the 2001 Wildcats.

Senior wide receiver Aaron Lockett said that fact makes a big difference in how a team bounces back.

"We have eight more games to go — one game is not the season," he said. "You're going to have your games where you wish things wouldn't have happened, but I think the fact that if we can go in there and play well this week, it would seem to keep things rolling."

Besides, the Wildcats cannot look at their matchup with Colorado as any bit of a step down from last weekend's tussle with the third-ranked Sooners, head coach Bill Snyder said — no matter what perceptions might be of the two opponents or what level of overconfidence tries to seep through.

"I'd love to believe that they understand the real danger in that type of approach," Snyder said. "Yet, they still are young people, and I'm kind of a redundant person, so we continually remind young people about those things and ourselves as well."

"But I don't think we're in that situation. We played an excellent football team, and we are going to play another excellent football team, so I don't think there is a marked difference in talent and performance up to this point in time. It's out of the frying pan and into the

Game 4: Colorado

Date & Time: 11:30 a.m., Saturday
Where: KSU Stadium (50,000), Manhattan, Kan.
TV: Fox Syndication
Radio: Wildcat Sports Network, 101.5 FM, 580 AM Facts: K-State will be looking to bounce back from its first Big 12 Conference loss of the season last weekend in Norman, Okla. The Cats have not started conference play 0-2 since 1992.

fire, so to speak."

But no matter what the circumstances — win or loss — Snyder said he'd hate for his team to take anything for granted.

"You would like to think that the players in your program would respond appropriately," he said. "All of what happens to us is insignificant. It's how we respond to it, and I think that's certainly true for this football team and our program."

"Our players have been good about how they've responded to a variety of different things — how they've responded to wins, how they've responded to losses, adversity, et cetera. But it becomes important for our players to understand that just because certain things take place previously, they will occur again."

"If you do all the things that you would intend to do week-in and week-out, then you've always got a chance to come back and win the next one."

That's certainly linebacker Ben Leber's intention.

The senior said the Cats watched tape of the OU game Monday, and although the team was disappointed in what they saw, their focus immediately turned to the Buffaloes.

"It's all a mindset," Leber said Tuesday. "I think coaches have already done a good job of motivating us, and you can already tell that this week is a lot different than the one after last year's loss. For whatever reason, I don't know why, but I think everybody's pretty much over it now and understands that we've still got a lot of football yet to be played."

Meanwhile, after enjoying a bye week, Colorado seems quite confident it can compete with K-State — even within the confines of KSU Stadium, offensive coordinator Ron Hudson said.

"Colorado sees the light at the end of the tunnel right now. They feel like they've had two weeks off, and they feel like they can come in here and have a chance," Hudson said. "Well, our players have to understand that we've been here before."

"We've got to put ourselves in position as coaches where we give them a chance to win and compete to the point where they understand how to win here — we're in our house. And I think that tradition will carry on, hopefully, and our players will compete and be tough."

Colorado quarterback Craig Ochs is brought down by K-State linebacker Ben Leber in last season's game against Colorado at Folsom Field in Boulder, Colo. Ochs relieved Buffs quarterback Bobby Pesavento in the second quarter and on his first drive drove Colorado 80 yards in seven plays to score a touchdown and went 15-of-24 on the day.

TIES THAT BIND

Buffaloes' quarterback takes road less traveled to CU

BY DEREK BOSS
Kansas State Collegian

Craig Ochs' ties to K-State don't stop with lineage.

The Colorado quarterback might be the cousin of two former Wildcats — defensive end Dirk Ochs (1992-95) and linebacker Travis Ochs (1995-98) — but on Sept. 30, 2000, the sophomore made his own Powercat association.

In Colorado's first series of the second quarter against K-State last year, CU head football coach Gary Barnett pulled Buffaloes' starter Bobby Pesavento, calling on Ochs to make his collegiate debut as a true freshman.

And Ochs responded.

On his first drive, the 6-foot-2, 215-pound QB led Colorado 80 yards in seven plays, capped by his 17-yard touchdown scramble to cut the Cat lead to 20-13.

Although K-State would prevail 44-21 at Folsom Field, Ochs would finish the game 15 of 24 passing for 208 passing, while adding 38 yards rushing on nine attempts. His aerial attack topped former Colorado QB Koy Detmer's record for most passing yards in a first appearance by a true freshman.

"I don't think as a defense we were expecting him to come out with that kind of confidence, or with his ability to run the ball," senior free safety Jon McGraw said. "So that's something we're definitely going to have to account for this year. We've already seen it against some of the team's they've already played."

"He does a tremendous job of reading his receivers, and if he doesn't see anything, pulling the ball down and running with it. That's something that's very tough to defend against, but it's something we've got to do."

That doesn't bode well for a K-State defense that has had trouble containing the quarterback this year. In the season-opener at USC, Carson Palmer led the Trojans in rushing with 60 yards on 12 carries — including a 27-yarder on the game's final drive — and three of his runs gave USC third-down conversions.

McGraw said he can see a clear comparison between Ochs and Palmer.

"I think he'd be very comparable to Palmer, with his ability to make quick decisions, pull the ball down, and do some good things on the ground," McGraw said. "And Palmer really hurt us with that, so it's something we've got to prepare for."

This season, Ochs has led the Buffaloes to three straight victories, with a 24.7 average margin of victory since dropping their season-opener against Fresno State.

Head coach Bill Snyder said Ochs has grown substantially since K-State saw him last fall. Statistically, he finished the 2000 campaign with CU freshman records for total offense (1,884), passing yards (1,778), attempts (245) and completions (145).

Already in 2001, Ochs has registered 885 passing yards in four games, while completing more than 60 percent of attempts (72 of 113).

"I think it's gone forward almost quarter by quarter — not only this season but the remainder of last season," Snyder said. "I think he has played improved football since that time, and he was pretty good at that time. He is obviously a very talented athlete — can do a lot of things — and he's a threat with the ball in his hands."

That threat was recruited by K-State out of Fairview High School in Boulder, Colo., but the long-term proximity to Colorado's campus proved to be the deciding factor for Ochs, Cat defensive coordinator Phil Bennett said. The family lineage with Dirk and Travis wasn't strong enough to turn him purple over silver, gold and black.

"He was pretty locked in with CU," Bennett said. "He was on a Rocky Mountain high."

K-State receivers gain experience, depth with big numbers in Oklahoma game

BY DEREK BOSS
Kansas State Collegian

It might seem typical for K-State offenses to have strong trios in its wide receiving corps.

In 1995, it was Kevin Lockett, Tyson Schwiager and Mitch Running.

Three seasons later, the focus shifted to Darnell McDonald, Aaron Lockett and Gavin Peries.

And last year proved no different, as Quincy Morgan, Lockett and Martez Wesley caught 120 of K-State's 166 completed passes.

But through the first two games of this season, a solid trio of Wildcat receivers seemed to be lacking. In fact, while Lockett had a combined seven receptions in the USC and New Mexico State contests, only one other player — tight end Nick Warren — had more than one catch for the purple.

Until last Saturday.

On the road in Norman, Okla., it was Brandon Clark and Ricky Lloyd's turn to lead K-State receiving corps, totaling nine catches for 212 yards.

"Those guys, they've just been waiting for an opportunity to step up and show what they can do," offensive tackle John Robertson said. "We've known it all along just from practicing with them every day."

"At the beginning of the season, there were some — I guess — question marks on our wide receivers, but I think everybody who's involved with the team kind of knew that these guys can step up and show everybody what they can do. And I think they're starting to do that, and you can probably expect quite a bit more from those guys."

Clark, a fifth-year senior from Valley Center, Kan., (High), has been ridden by injuries throughout much of his K-State career. The 6-foot-3, 220-pounder entered 1999 as the starting wideout alongside Morgan, but a re-injury to his foot sidelined him for all but one game that season.

On Saturday, though, Clark set a career-high in both catches (5) and yards (126) against the Oklahoma secondary, including a career-long 58-yard reception at the 9:45 mark of the second quarter, which set up Eli Robertson's 22-yard touchdown run.

"I was really pleased with Brandon and the way he performed in the ballgame," head coach Bill Snyder said. "He had the opportunity to catch five balls for over 100 yards — but you expect him to catch the ball. You expect that is going to happen if he gets himself where he needs to be."

Lloyd appeared to get himself in that position as well against the Sooners defensive backs.

With just over two minutes remaining and the Cats trailing 38-27, Lloyd streaked down the left hash and caught Robertson's fade pass in stride for a 57-yard touchdown, the longest of Lloyd's career and his first TD as a Wildcat.

"I thought the catch he made toward the end of the ballgame was really an exceptional catch — a hard catch, I'll put it that way," Snyder said.

"It's one of those that's almost coming straight over the top of your head, and those are very difficult balls to catch."

"But we expect that from Ricky — he just hasn't had the opportunity in the past."

Despite being a senior, Lloyd only is in his third year with the Wildcat program, coming to Manhattan from Senior Ricky Lloyd catches a pass in K-State's 38-37 loss to Oklahoma last weekend in Norman, Okla. Lloyd and senior Brandon Clark had big days against the Sooners.

Zach Long/Collegian

West College in California. The 5-foot-10, 160-pound wideout's four catches for 86 yards was his first multi-reception game in purple. Previously, he only had two catches for nine yards in his K-State career.

"I think Ricky's just showing some of the talent he's expressed through practice," Lockett said. "This was really the first time that he was able to transfer it into the game, and hopefully right now — as with Brandon — he can continue to do it from now on."

PUNT RETURN PRESSURE

Lockett, return team, struggle for consistency early, look to CU game for spark

BY BEN FEHR

Kansas State Collegian

The house.

That beautiful place. The destination of the top return teams in the country — the end zone.

Call it what you will. The house has been an elusive refuge for the K-State punt return team and return specialist Aaron Lockett this season.

Producing just one net yard in two chances at punt returns against Oklahoma, K-State has totaled only 82 yards in 12 returns so far this year.

Those low totals, head coach Bill Snyder said, have allowed opposing teams to enjoy a relatively uncommon comfort with Lockett's chances at returning the football.

"We are not scaring anybody," Snyder said. "And perhaps rightfully so because we really have not had any major returns, which we had kind of grown accustomed to."

Regardless of the frequency of punt return scores in the past, Snyder said consistency in scoring special teams touchdowns is not something one should take for granted.

"I do not know if this is one of those things someone anticipates

Senior Aaron Lockett has had trouble this year in the return game. As opponents prepare for K-State's traditionally strong special teams units, the Cats have seen a dropoff in big returns this season. Lockett has averaged 34 yards per kickoff return and just 6 yards per punt return.

is just going to happen," he said. "I certainly do not, and it has not."

Though it might not come easily, Snyder said improvement in the punt return game is something his staff and players must address as the season progresses.

"We have to improve what we are doing," Snyder said. "I do not think it is necessarily that anyone has made it more difficult for us to return punts by the way they are kicking the ball. By and large, it is us."

In the interest of improvement, Snyder said the return team must accept the low production as a unit and continue to work hard.

"It is not Aaron specifically," he said. "It is not any one individual. We have to be better in all aspects of our punt return team."

Lockett said getting better is the main goal for the Cats' punt return attack at this point.

"It is something we are definitely going to have to take notice of," he said. "I think we stumbled a bit last weekend. We could not get the return we were looking for."

Lockett said the Cats' struggles have given opposing teams confidence as they search for potential weaknesses in K-State's return ability.

"We have to look out," he said. "A lot of teams are focusing on our punt return unit, so we have to step it up a notch."

Taking it to the next level might not be too far away for the punt return team, Lockett said.

"Things come in bunches," he said. "It may take a while to break the first one, but then you are on that road."

Lockett said it could be the touchdowns that are coming in bunches before too long.

"We just need to continue to go out and work hard," he said.

"We know that we have the attitude and tenacity to hurt anybody."

Punting, kicking, areas of concern for Wildcats after mild performances

BY SEAN PURCELL

Kansas State Collegian

K-State might welcome back kicker and punter Jared Brite as early as this weekend as the Cats play host to the Colorado Buffaloes.

Not a moment too soon, either. The Wildcats' kicking game has been less than stellar the past two games, with a total of four extra points either missed or blocked. The last time Brite was the go-to kicker for the Cats was Sept. 8, when K-State squared off against Southern California to open the season.

Since then, Brite, who was not available for comment, has been missing in action with an injury that has yet to be revealed to the public.

Senior offensive lineman Andy Eby said the team is excited to get Brite back, whenever that might be.

"Jared is a very good kicker, and we've missed him out there," he said. "I don't expect it to be too long until he is back kicking for us."

Head coach Bill Snyder said he hoped Brite's return would have been last weekend in Norman, Okla., for the game against the Sooners.

In that battle with the Sooners, junior kicker Kyle Altwater had an extra point blocked in the third quarter, forcing the Cats to successfully complete a two-point conversion late in the game. It also put pressure on the defense to not allow another Oklahoma touchdown. Snyder said he expects Brite to be available for this weekend's game.

"When he is back, he will probably do both kicking and punting for us," he said. "It's not a given, though, that that will be the case."

Eby said Brite is one of many leaders on the Cats' football team. Each practice, Brite has been improving and kicking more in hopes of getting back on the field for K-State.

"We've been fortunate the last few years to have great kickers in this program like Martin (Gramatica) and Jamie (Rheem)," he said. "Brite has a tremendous leg, almost better than those two guys. He is a valuable player for this team."

Questions started arising about Brite's absence when K-State missed three straight extra point attempts in the Cats' 64-0 victory over New Mexico State. Snyder said there are some definite problems that need ironing out in the K-State kicking game.

"I am concerned about all aspects of our kicking game," he said. "Some areas we are making improvements in and some areas we are not. That is a concern for us."

Brite's return might give K-State that added weapon down the stretch when the Cats are looking for a long field goal to win the ball game.

"You definitely need a guy who can kick a 50-yard field goal for you," Eby said.

"Brite is the type of guy that can do that for us."

Yellow flag blues

Penalties, mental mistakes, plague Wildcats in Oklahoma defeat

BY MICHAEL NOLL
Kansas State Collegian

Even though K-State was flagged for 17 penalties against Oklahoma last Saturday, the team won't necessarily spend any more time than usual working to ensure that a similar situation doesn't occur against Colorado on Saturday.

"I have been putting as much emphasis as I thought we possibly could on avoiding penalties for the last 12 years," head coach Bill Snyder said.

Nevertheless, Snyder said he doesn't deny that penalties played a significant part in the loss to Oklahoma.

"Seventeen penalties in one ballgame are a substantial number, and it proves that you cannot be a good football team being penalized that way," Snyder said. "We proved it. We are proof in the pudding. It will jump up and get you, and we have to be able to do our part in being able to eliminate those."

Eliminating those penalties, he said, takes more than talk by the coaches.

"It's more than just saying, 'Don't do this. Don't line up off sides. Don't be in motion. Don't hit somebody late. Don't hold. Don't do these things,'" Snyder said. "We have to do an adequate job in terms of those penalties that are viable penalties. We have to teach youngsters exactly how to do the things that prevent penalties."

Even if players try hard not to get flagged, the natural motion of the

Mike Shepherd/Collegian

Defensive backs DeRon Tyler and Terence Newman react to a pass interference penalty in the fourth quarter of last weekend's game against Oklahoma. The Wildcats were penalized 17 times for 139 against the Sooners, and have been flagged a total of 39 times this season for 322 yards.

game often puts them in awkward positions. For example, defensive backs and wide receivers are bound to bump each other.

"Sometimes you just have a mental breakdown where you're trying so hard to make the play, and then you kind of bump into the receiver or you get more physical," cornerback DeMarcus Faggins said. "When the ball is thrown in the air, it's kind of too late."

The uncertainty, then, lies in which player will be flagged. All too often, Faggins said, it's the defensive player.

"When the referee calls it, most of the time it can go either way. They mostly call it on the defense," he said. "It's hard. The receivers are being just as physical as the defensive backs, so, like I said, they mostly give it to the offense."

The offensive line is an area in which players often have no choice but to use their hands and possibly questionable methods to stop defensive players.

"You could call holding on every down on the offensive line if you wanted to because it's just really a judgment call," guard Andy Eby said. "Sometimes they call it, sometimes they don't. It just really depends on the referees and what kind of mood they're in. You've got to be on their good side."

Despite the officials' watchful eyes, though, there are methods to look less guilty of a penalty — but they're top secret.

"There's a lot of tricks to the trade. I don't want to say them because they'll talk about them, but you've just got to learn what they will allow and what they won't allow," Eby said. "It just takes some experience to get used to it."

Other penalties, like off-sides, simply are mental. But even though the player only must remember the snap count, that simple task can be difficult.

"You've just got so much to concentrate on the offensive line," Eby said. "You've got so many blocking schemes, and you've got people moving around, and the crowd noise — you're trying to listen to the snap count, trying to get yourself pumped up to come off the ball — there's so much going on in your head, sometimes that you forget the most important thing."

While penalties are accurately called the majority of the time, occasionally, a coach honestly believes an official missed the call. In those times, there is a prescribed procedure to follow when complaining about calls to the Big 12 Conference office.

Coaches from around the league send in tapes of the calls in question, and those are reviewed by league officials, who then rule on the matter. However, this procedure might, in effect, be more of a way for coaches to blow off steam than to actually get individual calls addressed.

Snyder, for instance, has sent in tapes for review but never has seen any effects on the field.

"Not in my lifetime," he said.

CU mascot tells it like it is, predicts romp over Wildcats

Colorado's return to its premier position in Big 12 North begins Saturday in Manhattan. Sure, K-State almost beat Oklahoma. Big deal. K-State almost got beat by a mediocre Southern California team.

Sure, K-State's defense kept Oklahoma to nine yards rushing, but a seventh-grade "B" team could have done as much, and it probably wouldn't have given up two touch-down passes over 60 yards.

The Buffs, behind sophomore sensation Chris Brown, are averaging 245 yards rushing per game, eighth in the nation. The Wildcats' linebackers might be considered the best in the nation, but they are going to get flattened by Colorado's offensive line.

K-State fans had better get used to signaling first downs for Colorado.

In addition, Colorado's passing game, led by Craig Ochs, is rapidly improving. Plus, we all remember last season in Boulder, when Ochs made the "vaunted" Wildcat secondary look like so many slices of Swiss cheese.

Speaking of which, how cheesy is your mascot, Willie the Wildcat? He's a skinny wannabe cheerleader who does halfway pushups and performs the same "K-S-U-Wildcats" cheer over and over and over.

Congratulations, Willie. You know the name of your school and its mascot.

Back to the game, though. Quarterback Eli Roberson might have lit up the Oklahoma defense, but look for another USC-type passing game from him against the Buffs. Colorado already has played a tough passing game in Fresno State. Anything K-State tries to do will look like child's play.

Also, running backs Josh Scobey and Rock Cartwright had better just take a knee rather than test the Colorado front four and linebackers. They might think they're the equal of Nebraska's backfield, but they never will be more than just pretenders.

The same is true for the entire K-State team and all its fans. Your brief period of success in the Big 12 is over. It's time for the real title contenders to take over again.

Colorado is a contender for a BCS bowl. For K-State — well, Mele Kalikimaka is Hawaii's way of saying "Merry Christmas" to you.

The writer is a die-hard Colorado fan. You can e-mail him at buffsfan99@hotmail.com.

Denver columnist inaccurate; K-State will stomp Buffaloes

Poor Colorado.

I can't help but feel sorry for these feeble, defenseless brutes — who have no idea what's in store this weekend.

Not only do the Buffaloes feel overconfident about their chances against No. 12/13 K-State, but they seem to want everybody else to know about it.

Frankly, I don't care.

Say what you want. Talk your heads off until you're blue in the face. Threaten to open your can of "Whoop Ass." None of that matters Saturday — zip, zero, zilch.

Why? Because no bulletin board material is needed for this weekend — K-State will kick the crap out of Colorado regardless — but it sure is flowing like the salmon of Capiutano.

It seems that any media outlet within a 30-mile radius of Boulder is taking potshots at Manhattan as well.

Just look at a couple of excerpts from Thursday's sports column in the Denver Post: For the faithful who bleed CU black and gold, what hurts most aren't those nine consecutive losses to Nebraska, but the undeniable

Derek Boss

fact the Buffaloes have been supplanted among the nation's elite by Kansas State, a nowhere school that's nothing more than a truck stop filled with junior college transients who couldn't make the grade as real students.

Sound bitter to anyone else?

Just because K-State has slapped CU around for the past four years doesn't warrant this pathetic display.

Yes, the Buffaloes once were strong contenders in the Big 12 North, but now it's K-State — so shut up and deal with it. What does he think this is, the return desk at Macy's?

But that wasn't the only piece of incoherent rambling from that sports column. Check this out:

While you can find nearly everything wrong with college football in the grouchy mug of Kansas State coach Bill Snyder, whining won't beat him.

Wow, the smog and overcast clouds in the Denver area yesterday really must be getting to this moron.

Snyder might have his unique style, keeping his program under tight wraps, but the things he's done in Manhattan are unprecedented. Yet, it seems like only a national championship will ever rid him — or K-State for that matter — of pesky critics.

But then again, of course Colorado people are going to take shots at Snyder. Look at them — they've got Gary Barnett, the man who said anything less than a trip to the Big 12 Championship will be a failure for this year's Buffaloes.

Since those odds are about as good as Cheech and Chong passing a piss test, I'll say it once more.

Poor Colorado.

BSU sponsors first fashion show

BY KECIA N. SEYB
Kansas State Collegian

They weren't models from a runway in New York City, but Black Student Union members showed off the latest fashions of the Manhattan Town Center on Saturday night on the Forum Hall stage in the K-State Student Union.

BSU put its first fashion show with party, sports, formal, casual and businesswear they borrowed from the mall.

Jennifer Fennell, junior in kinesiology, said the fashion show was her and another member's idea. She said she was very pleased with the show and plans on doing it again next year.

"I liked the way everything went," she said.

The curtain first opened with smoke rising and four couples dancing onstage to Jagged Edge's "Where the Party At," while each model took his or her turn strutting to the front of the stage to show off dark denim, sweaters, signature shirts, glittered pants and pleather-two-pieces.

One of the models, Brian Thornton, sophomore in business marketing, said he thought he did pretty well at his first time modeling.

"I was a little tense at first. But as soon as I heard the music and saw the beautiful crowd, I was relaxed and excited," Thornton said.

Two women sitting on a bench in their casualwear of Gap maroon, tan and beige skirts, pants and jackets opened the next scene while Outkast's "So Fresh and So Clean" played. The men walked by in their casual leather jackets, turtlenecks, sweaters and cargo pants from The Gap, The Buckle and Dillard's.

Kedric Elmore, sophomore in civil engineering, said the casualwear was his favorite to wear and that he wishes he could keep all the clothes he modeled.

"Yeah, I felt sexy," he said. "I just really enjoyed myself."

The models then pretended to play a game of baseball, men against women, running from base to base after swinging the bat, while sporting their sports wear. Their latest trends included fashions of Ralph Lauren, Nike and Adidas from Gadzooks, Finish Line, Footlocker and The Buckle.

Next, the models strode across the stage with newspapers and cellular phones, ready for business.

The men wore black, gray and blue double-breasted business suits from J.C. Penney's, while the women wore three-quarter length styled suits.

After an intermission of drawing four tickets and giving out prizes — two for Frosties — and the recitation of a poem to music, the show ended with formal wear.

dress that crisscrossed low in the back met a man in a black pin-striped tuxedo and walked underneath an arch of balloons while R & B music played.

Maurice Parks, president of BSU, said the formal and business scenes were his favorite of the night.

"I really liked the business and formalwear," he said. "People feel really good about dressing up — there's just an air about you when you dress up."

Parks said he was pleased with the turnout, guessing that there were 150 people who attended. He said, however, some audience members were missing.

"I went to SGA to encourage them to come once again," he said. "We gotta have that support. It's not just for black people — it's for everybody."

Thornton said he liked the red and black business suit he wore the best, but he liked hearing the yells from the crowd the most.

"My favorite part was when the ladies started yelling for me," he said.

Parks said he was proud of the committee for putting the show together.

"We're just waiting for bigger and better things next year," he said. "I just want to give a lot of appreciation to the people who came and helped out. Hopefully, the gelling together will carry on to other groups and organizations."

CAMPUS Post Card

Jane Titterington

Jane Titterington, senior in microbiology, was named one of the 32 nationwide recipients of the 2001 American Society for Microbiology Undergraduate Research Fellowship.

"It was a long shot. I was really surprised when I got it," Titterington said.

The winners of this fellowship are awarded a $2,500 stipend, a one-year student membership to the American Society of Microbiology and reimbursement for travel expenses to present their finding at the next annual meeting.

Titterington's research in "Functional Dissection of the Baculovirus Late Expression Factor-8 Gene: Sequence Requirements for Late Gene Promoter Activation," won her this honor. The Howard Hughes Medical Institute Undergraduate Biological Sciences Education Program, coordinated through K-State's Division of Biology, got Titterington started on her laboratory research.

Titterington said she chose this research topic because of her interest in virology and molecular biology.

Arabs locally ask for direct actions

BY SARAH BAHARI
Kansas State Collegian

Arabs and Muslims in Manhattan hoped Sunday that the United States would limit its attacks to strategic points and spare the lives of civilians.

"I'm hoping they hit the right targets. I'm concerned for the innocent people," said Fayeze Hussein, adviser of the Muslim Student Association. "I'm hoping justice takes place, and there is an end to the terror."

"I'm hoping they take a peaceful approach."

Hussein, who is from Syria, has family in Syria and Saudi Arabia.

He recently talked to his brother in Saudi Arabia and said he was fine.

"We're concerned for them, and they're more concerned for us," he said.

His family in the Middle East has heard much about the backlash against Arabs in the United States, Hussein said. But in Manhattan, things have been peaceful, he said.

Ibrahim Al Omar, a doctoral student from Saudi Arabia, said the United States must plan its actions carefully.

"As we condemned that action in New York and Washington, we should do so for the killing of innocent people everywhere," he said. "It is against our faith to kill innocent people."

Dean of the College of Business Yar Ebadi, who is from Afghanistan, has not been able to contact his family in Afghanistan yet.

He said that like everyone, he has been watching the news to keep updated.

And like everyone, Ebadi said he hopes that some good can come out of what has happened.

"If casualties of civilians are light and the end of this process comes soon, and a government will come to power in Afghanistan that truly represents the people," he said.

"And terrorism is eradicated. That is the hope of everyone."

WASHINGTON, D.C. — American and British forces unleashed punishing air strikes Sunday against military targets and Osama bin Laden's training camps inside Afghanistan, aiming at terrorists blamed for the Sept. 11 attacks that killed thousands in New York and Washington, D.C.

"We will not waver. We will not tire," said President Bush, speaking from the White House as Tomahawk cruise missiles and bombs found targets halfway around the globe. "We will not falter, and we will not fail."

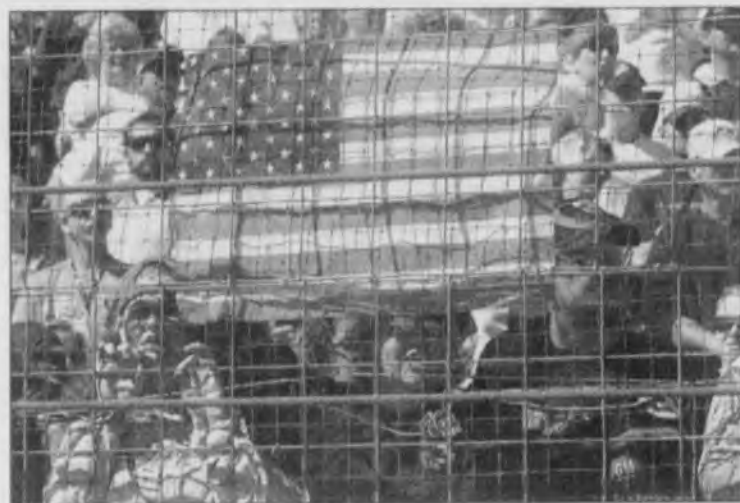

The opening of a sustained campaign dubbed "Enduring Freedom," the assault was accompanied by airdrops of thousands of vitamin-enriched food rations for needy civilians — and by a ground-based attack by Afghan opposition forces against the ruling Taliban.

In a chilling threat, bin Laden vowed defiantly that "neither America nor the people who live in it will dream of security before we live in it in Palestine, and not before all the infidel armies leave the land of Muhammad." That was an apparent reference to Israel and Saudi Arabia. He spoke in a videotaped statement prepared before the attacks, but both he and the leader of the Taliban ruling council of Afghanistan were reported to have survived the initial aerial assault.

In a fresh reminder of the potential for renewed terrorist attacks, the FBI said it was urging law enforcement agencies nationwide to be at the highest level of vigilance and be prepared to respond to any act of terrorism or violence.

Bush gave the final go-ahead for the strike Saturday, less than four weeks after terrorists flew two hijacked airplanes into the World Trade Center twin towers and a third into the Pentagon. A fourth plane crashed in the Pennsylvania countryside after an apparent struggle between passengers and terrorists on board.

In addition to the Sept. 11 death toll — estimated at more than 5,000 — the attacks dealt a shuddering blow to Americans' feeling of security, and propelled an already weakened economy toward recession.

Bush said the military action was designed to clear the way for sustained, comprehensive and relentless operations to bring the terrorists to justice.

Sen. Carl Levin, D-Mich., said the ultimate goal is to bring down the Taliban, allowing Afghan rebels to assume power and tighten the noose around bin Laden. "It would be better if the Afghan people could bring him down," said Levin, chairman of the Senate Armed Services Committee.

"I know many Americans feel fear today," Bush said in his nationally televised announcement from the White House Treaty Room.

Signs of heightened security concerns were evident. As officials took Vice President Dick Cheney from his residence to an undisclosed secure location, security was stepped up around the Capitol and government nuclear weapons labs were put on higher alert. The FBI said it was acting on the basis of the possibility of additional terrorist activity occurring somewhere in the world.

In Saudi Arabia, the U.S. Embassy remained closed Monday, and authorities cautioned Americans to review their own security precautions.

Within hours of the attacks, Bush drew public support from foreign leaders around the world — including a statement from the Russian Foreign Ministry. Congressional leaders chorused their approval, as did the American public.

A crowd of 64,000 cheered the president's words at Veterans Stadium in Philadelphia, where the beginning of a professional football game was delayed so the fans could view Bush's appearance on the big screen scoreboard. Chants of "USA, USA" filled another stadium, this one in Atlanta.

The initial strike involved 50 Tomahawk cruise missiles, launched from American and British ships. Gen. Richard Myers said 15 bombers and 25 strike aircraft, both sea and land-based, also were involved. The assault came at 12:30 p.m. EDT — nighttime in Afghanistan.

Myers, sworn into office as chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff less than a week ago, said the attacks included B-1, B-2 and B-52 bombers as well as ships and submarines that have been deployed in the region in the days since Sept. 11.

The B-52s dropped at least dozens of 500-pound gravity bombs on al-Qaeda terrorist training camps in eastern Afghanistan, one official said.

Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld said the strikes were designed to eliminate the Taliban's air defenses and destroy their military aircraft. Afghanistan's rulers are known to have a

U.S. officials discuss actions with key allies

BY GEORGE GEDDA
The Associated Press

WASHINGTON, D.C. — President Bush and senior U.S. officials, in an urgent round of phone calls, alerted world leaders from Russia to Asia to the Middle East as the United States launched military strikes inside Afghanistan on Sunday.

Secretary of State Colin Powell planned later this week to travel to Pakistan, a key ally in the U.S. terror war and neighbor to Afghanistan, and to India to shore up diplomatic support for military retaliation.

Bush telephoned Russian President Vladimir Putin to inform him of the attacks.

Putin has provided welcome support to the U.S. operation, opening Russia's airspace to U.S. deliveries of humanitarian aid and encouraging Afghanistan's neighbors in Central Asia to lend their support for the operation.

French President Jacques Chirac said in a nationally televised address that he also spoke with Bush and suggested that French forces could play a direct role in the military offensive.

Bush, Vice President Dick Cheney and Powell called more than a dozen leaders, administration officials said.

Powell worked the telephones from his suburban Virginia home, calling Mexican President Vicente Fox, Japanese Prime Minister Junichiro Koizumi, U.N. Secretary General Kofi Annan, the amir of Bahrain Khalifa Hamad, Sultan Qaboos of Oman and the leaders of five former Soviet republics: Georgia, Kazakhstan, Ukraine, Tajikistan and Turkmenistan.

The latter two are considered to be potentially important strategically because of their shared borders with Afghanistan.

They might be asked for their cooperation in the event of U.S. land operations into Afghanistan.

Leaders in Jordan, Israel, Germany, Egypt and Canada also received calls from top U.S. officials.

Powell and Deputy Secretary of State Richard Armitage informed key Senate and House members of the operation.

Within hours of the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks, the administration began rallying international support for a campaign against terrorism.

The focus shifted to Osama bin Laden and his al-Qaeda group as evidence accumulated that they were responsible for the attacks on the World Trade Center and the Pentagon.

As a result of these efforts, Bush said Sunday that more than 40 countries in the Middle East, Africa, Europe and Asia have granted air transit or landing rights.

As the attacks began, the State Department warned of the possibility of strong anti-American sentiment and retaliatory actions against U.S. citizens and interests throughout the world. Any Americans remaining in Afghanistan were urged to leave.

Students mostly uninformed about Sunday's U.S., British strikes on Taliban targets

BY ALYSON RALETZ
Kansas State Collegian

Rolling out of their beds on a late Sunday afternoon, many K-State students did not realize that U.S. and British forces had dropped 50 missiles on Afghanistan at 11:27 that morning.

By 3 p.m., Julia Galstad, sophomore in math, said she still knew nothing about the U.S. advance on Afghanistan.

"I usually read newspapers at dinner to catch up on news, so I really haven't heard anything about the attacks in Afghanistan attacks yet," Galstad said.

She was not alone. Mella Eiland, junior in elementary education, said she had been out all morning.

"I didn't know," Eiland said. "I was at church earlier today, and we didn't talk about it there."

She said she did not hear anything about the attacks on the radio and did not watch TV news when she got home because she has grown bored of the coverage.

"I just stopped watching the news because it seemed to be saying the same thing over and over again," she said. "Now that I know, I haven't really had a chance to think about it."

Other students did not complain of boredom; they simply never watch the news.

"I usually don't watch the news," Ryan Shelton, junior in computer science, said. "I don't know what the hell is going on right now. We attacked the Afghans?"

Mike Juliff, sophomore in biology and resident at Goodnow Hall, said he found out about the bombings through word of mouth.

"I've known for a couple of hours, but only because a guy came in my room and yelled, 'Hey, we bombed the Afghans,'" Juliff said. "I really haven't been following it on the news."

Sean Brimer, junior in biology and Goodnow resident assistant, said he did not think many of the building's residents knew of the attacks by Sunday afternoon.

"Many students are just not into current events," Brimer said. "A lot of students won't find out about this until they read it in Monday's Collegian."

He said the building's environment Sept. 11 was busier, and everyone seemed to show more concern.

"It's a lot quieter today because the student body supports the attack," he said. "I think everyone expected this, but they didn't know when to expect it."

Across the nation, many Americans attending National Football League and baseball games watched President Bush announce the attacks on the stadiums' big screens.

In Topeka, as government officials learned of the strikes, they ordered police officers to heighten security on downtown buildings and the Statehouse.

At K-State, President Jon Wefald gave his reactions on the Afghanistan bombings.

"I certainly support what the President of the United States is doing," Wefald said. "I think everyone's going to be more visual from coast to coast, so we're going to be visual, but we're going to be very calm."

On campus, several students said they were worried of the Taliban's retaliation efforts.

Ryan Gates, freshman in computer information systems, said he understands Bush's decision, but it might trigger more anger.

"There's going to be a war — a full-force war," Gates said. "I'm sure we had our reasons, and they were good reasons, but this will only lead to more violence. The fighting will keep going on."

The Taliban will want revenge, Mark Courtney, sophomore in architecture, said, but it will not be successful.

"They will retaliate, but it will not even compare to Sept. 11," Courtney said. "If something is going to happen, it will be relatively small. Security has been raised. America is more alert."

"The ability to plan something as big as the tragedy in New York is not possible because the environment is not as conducive as it was before."

Even though the retributions might be little, he said parts of the country still are vulnerable to them.

"Since today's attack, I feel less safe because there will be more of a want of retaliation against the U.S.," he said.

— The Associated Press contributed to this article.

Christine Romeu, senior in elementary education

"I think if they're harboring Osama Bin Laden, they deserve what they get. I'm sorry. For as many people who died in New York, Bin Laden deserves to pay."

Mandy Adler, senior in art education

"All we're thinking of is revenge, revenge, revenge. Obviously, they started it, but they wanted to start a war. They're not going to leave it at just that."

Matt Schmidt, freshman in computer engineering

"I support the Afghanistan attacks because they have been harboring terrorists for a long time and wouldn't cooperate. That is just as bad as terrorism."

Gabe Lockwood, sophomore in international business

"I knew it was coming. It was just a matter of time. I just think if my parents were in the World Trade Center when it blew up, it's a justified revenge. We've let it slide way too long."

Maria Gamil, senior in biology

"They will try to come back and hurt us, but I don't know how effective it will be. We will come back harder. There are going to be a lot of innocent lives lost, whether it is here or overseas."

Beth Karleskint, sophomore in elementary education

"I don't really support war, but you have to do what you have to do. Attacking Afghanistan may not have been the best way to send a message, but there weren't a lot of choices."

Campus, nation should support the President

On Sept. 11 the pulse of America rose to dangerous levels. We were terrified, anxious, enraged, saddened and horrified. Suddenly, everything that was seen as important became frivolous. On the most basic level, we redirected our sight to the vital — economics, mourning and a steadfast and strong level of patriotism.

But our attention span has become shorter. President Bush asked us to move on with our lives. We did. The deep slash cut by the terrorists that ran through our nation began to heal.

Two weeks ago, in an address to the nation, Bush announced a list of demands he had for the terrorists. Bush called for the closing of terrorist training camps, the handing over of leaders of the al-Qaeda network, and returning all foreign nationals unjustly detained in their country.

None of these demands were met, and the rallying cry of war began to quiet.

Bush had to take action. He did.

On Sunday afternoon, Bush — with the help of Great Britain — launched a military attack in Afghanistan.

In his address to the nation, Bush announced the United States is backed by Britain and more than 40 other nations. He called the bombing of Afghanistan a target action and said they were carefully targeted, and the aim was to cut the military capability of the Taliban regime.

A little less than a month later, our pulse rate has begun to rise once again. Many are face-to-face with the same emotions they felt Sept. 11 — terrified, anxious, enraged, saddened and horrified. Some are happy for the attacks on our enemies.

Bush might declare war this week. We might be attacked on our soil again, but as we court uncertainty day after day, we must not let fear or irrational thinking overtake us.

We must never forget the pain and memory of those who died Sept. 11. No matter how raw it was, we must not forget our initial reactions of those early days. But we also must continue to live our lives, push forward and embrace patriotism.

Sunday's attacks on Afghanistan were surprising, but we must stand behind our president.

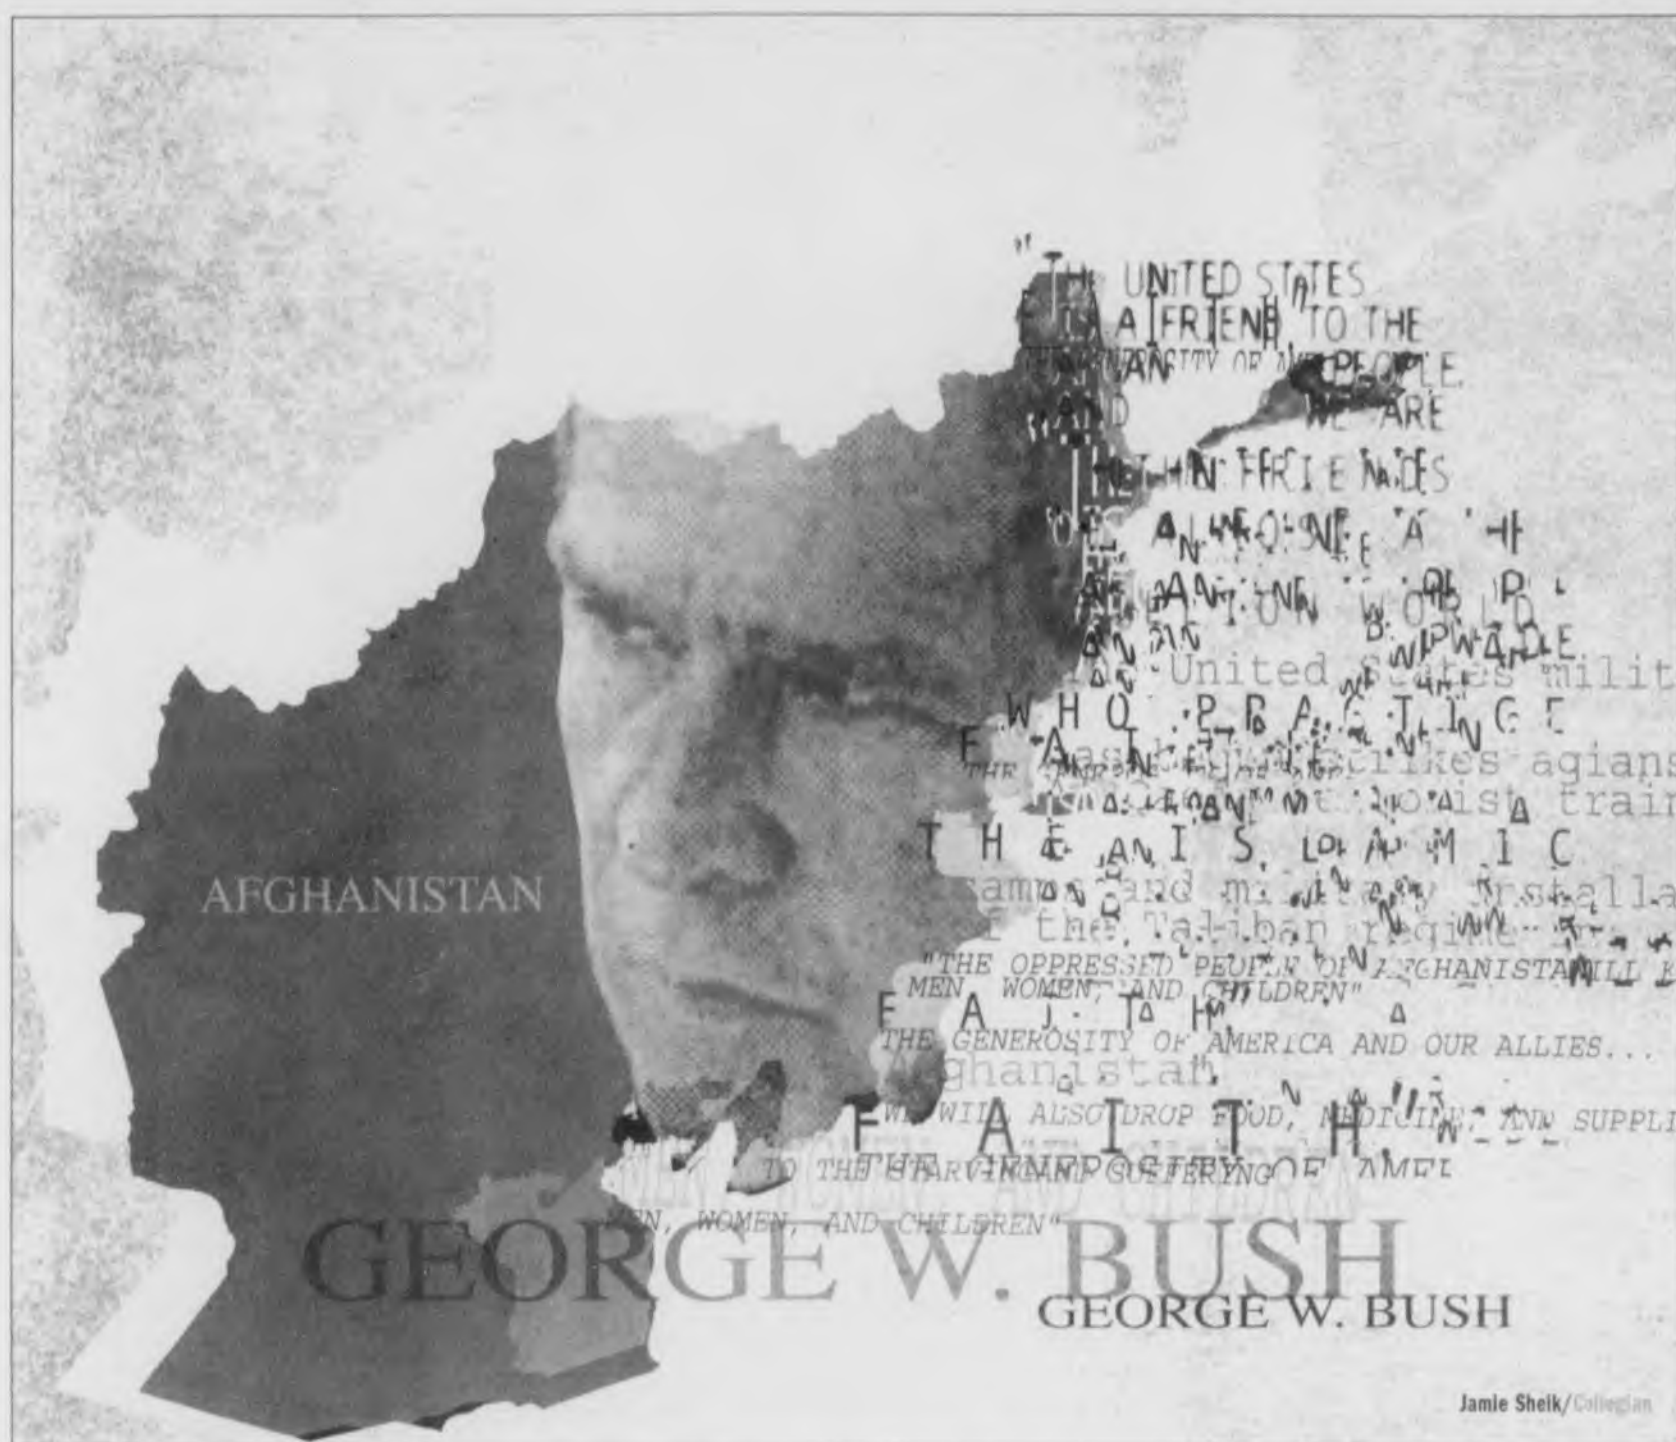

The world virtually is on our side. Our allies are many, and the word freedom has been given a definite meaning for a younger generation.

As we launch our attack, we must continue to stand strong and firm as a nation and as a campus. We cannot let our fear or want to forget divide us. As we forge on we must keep rational thought and calamity by our bedside table.

Expected military action necessary

After the infamous attacks on Washington, D.C., and New York City last month, perhaps only one thing was clear:

Keira Mann

President Bush. Kind words and sympathies would not be enough for the American people. Americans wanted and deserved justice.

The country couldn't help but wonder what kind of action possibly could be taken in fighting this almost invisible, always transitory enemy — terrorism.

Could Bush be trusted to handle this national tragedy effectively and reasonably? The hearts of a nation, torn at its seams, is it could hope so.

From the beginning, Americans were pleased. In its Oct. 8 issue, Newsweek magazine reported Bush's approval rate to be a resounding 88 percent.

The fear-inspiring talks of bombing Afghanistan, and taking Bin Laden at all costs, had subsided as the promising voice of rationalism and patience began to seep through the cracks.

Now, more than three weeks after being put to the test, Bush finally has made his impact.

Yesterday, while many Americans were returning home from church or settling down to eat lunch, the United States, in partnership with Great Britain, dropped its first bombs on Afghanistan.

The target hits were planned and strategic military targets. Among these locations were the Taliban headquarters, military communication sites and terrorist training camps inside the Afghanistan borders.

This action, although certainly not unanticipated, has been an abrupt change in the placidity and patience that had been adopted in the past several weeks.

Prior to these attacks, missiles and bombers had taken a back seat to gaining international support and creating necessary allies.

In the last three weeks, the United Nations passed a unanimous resolution against terrorism, making willful and knowledgeable support of terrorist action a state-sponsored crime.

In the Middle East, the president grasped the encouragement he needed. Importantly, the United Arab Emirates cut ties to the Taliban, and the Saudi's government publicly authorized the United States to use its military bases, if necessary.

The president also signed a document freezing the funds of several suspected terrorists.

These measures, while viewed as some as overly passive, were easier to accept than the alternative: the bloodshed and bombing ignited by Sunday's attacks.

A final golden strategy on this ever darkening horizon, was humanitarianism. This strategy was supposed to offer humanitarian aid and relief to the people of Afghanistan in hopes of extracting them from the rickety Taliban and exposing bin Laden as a criminal.

Bush reported that this humanitarian effort will not be abandoned. In a speech given Sunday, Bush said, "As we strike military targets, we will also drop food, medicine and supplies to the starving and suffering men, women and children of Afghanistan."

In the previous three weeks, we were allowed time for the heart of our own nation to begin its healing. Now we only can hope that the actions taken Sunday were appropriate actions that will cause minimal bleeding and only temporary lacerations on the hearts of others.

While things are uncertain at this point in time, we can only hold our breath and watch as this war on terrorism unfolds. We are also being forced to keep our fingers crossed and have faith that the United States government, under the cautious direction of Bush, will give us reason to keep standing proud.

If nothing else, this tragedy has proven that as people and a country, we are strong and capable of making rational decisions. As a nation, we have countless reasons to stand loyal, united and proud.

While things are uncertain at this point in time, we can only hold our breath and watch as this war on terrorism unfolds. We also are being forced to keep our fingers crossed and have faith that the United States government, under the cautious direction of Bush, will give us reason to keep standing proud.

Fort Riley increases security, limits entry

BY DANA STRONGIN
Kansas State Collegian

Fort Riley's security is higher than usual because of the nation's situation.

"We are continuing to take appropriate measures to protect the safety of our soldiers, their families and our employees," said Christie Vanover, deputy media relations officer for the base.

Current measures reflect those implemented Sept. 11. Access to the installation requires a Department of Defense ID or special pass. Contract employees are allowed inside.

"Those without the proper credentials may have their vehicles searched," Vanover said.

Only four access points remain open. These are Henry Road at Interstate 70, Huebner Road at Ogden, Trooper Drive in Junction City and 12th Street near Ogden. Commercial traffic, which includes delivery trucks, is limited to the 12th Street entrance.

Vanover could not disclose specifics involving security and deployment orders for security reasons.

Northern Alliance attacks

BY ALEXANDER MERKUSHEV
Associated Press Writer

CHARIKAR, Afghanistan — The Afghan opposition launched an assault on the ruling Taliban militia from an air force base just north of the capital, in an attack coordinated with Sunday's U.S.-led military action against Afghanistan.

Northern alliance forces that control the Bagram air force base fired multiple-rocket launchers at Taliban forces that control the surrounding mountains. The Taliban returned fire using Soviet-made BM-21 rockets.

The base is about 25 miles north of the capital, Kabul, and the opposition has suggested it eventually could be used as a base for U.S. forces. The Taliban still dominates the high mountains around the base.

The opposition forces attacked Taliban positions at around 10 p.m., about an hour after the U.S.-led strikes against Afghanistan began. By 3 a.m. Monday, the fighting had subsided.

The northern alliance, in control of roughly 5 percent of Afghanistan, has been fighting the Taliban for years.

Retaliation possible after U.S. action

BY MICHAEL WATSON
Reuters Staff Columnist

The State Department warned Americans there is a possibility of strong anti-American sentiment and retaliatory actions against U.S. citizens and interests throughout the world.

Retaliatory actions might be taken by terrorists and those who are sympathetic to or support terrorism, the department said in issuing a world-wide caution.

"There will be a retaliation," Linda Richter, professor of political science, said.

"How and what form? I don't know. It's really hard to predict, but there will be a response. I can think of a lot simpler attacks than the one they pulled on Sept. 11. There are some things that are easy to do, and we may see those."

Officials in the Senate Intelligence Committee and Congress said Americans should be alert to the possibility of more attacks at home.

Sen. Bob Graham, D-Fla., on ABC's "This Week," said he predicted terrorists would use means other than airline hijackings Sept. 11 to create a pervasive sense of fear.

"The way to do that is to attack us in as many different forms as possible," he said. "I believe that once we do start direct military engagement in Afghanistan, the threat level is likely to go up because there will be a tendency for the terrorists to want to cause us to step back."

Richter said Osama bin Laden's network has shown an interest in biological and chemical weapons.

Mohamed Atta, confirmed hijacker from the attack on America, had shown interest in crop dusting equipment.

There also were suspects trying to get their license for trucks to carry chemicals across the United States.

The United States was not prepared to deal with what happened in New York and Washington, D.C. She said the United States now is in a crash course to get precautions concerning public health up to speed.

"People are already infected with disease through travel accidentally. Now the problem is compounded because it may be done deliberately," she said.

"The combination is scary."

Richter said the attacks will hurt the tourism industry in many economies.

"We have already seen the airplane industry and the travel industry in trouble," she said. "This ripples throughout the economy."

Traveling Americans have been urged to take precautions. Americans in Afghanistan, which harbors bin Laden, should depart the country, the government said. Americans elsewhere were urged to monitor the local news, stay in touch with the nearest U.S. embassy or consulate and limit their movement.

Richter said she is worried about the Pakistani government. She said it is fragile.

"Pakistan is one of three countries that recognized Taliban as a government before Sept. 11," she said.

"Pakistan is vulnerable because the leaders decided to side with the United States."

"There is also an enormous refugee crisis."

Refugees are trying to get out of Kabul. Pakistan has accepted some of them, but they can't accept all of them.

"They have closed their border. We can see this spiraling into a much larger situation in this area."

On Thursday, Washington's 18 allies in NATO made good on their pledge of solidarity by granting the United States automatic and unlimited access to their airfields and ports.

They also agreed to deploy ships and early-warning radar planes in support of the anti-terrorism campaign and to plug any holes in NATO power if U.S. troops are pulled from Europe for duty against terrorist targets.

On Tuesday, NATO declared the Sept. 11 attacks on the United States an attack against all 19 members.

K-State volleyball team loses tight Big 12 match against Colorado

BY SEAN PURCELL
Kansas State Collegian

The K-State volleyball team saw a tight match slip through its fingers Saturday night as the Cats fell to Colorado in four sets.

The win marked the first time in nearly four years the Buffaloes were able to defeat the Cats on their home turf.

Colorado (9-4, 4-2) dominated No. 25 K-State (8-5, 4-3) statistically, tallying close to 20 more kills (80-57) and 33 more digs (88-55) en route to a 30-20, 27-30, 30-28, 31-29 victory.

In game one, Colorado took control early with seven straight points before the Cats closed to 7-4. Colorado would extend its advantage to 10 points in an eventual 30-20 victory.

Led by senior Sonja Russell's five kills, the Buffaloes recorded a .444 hitting percentage in the win. Senior Lisa Mimick and sophomore Cari Jensen each had three kills for the Wildcats, in the first set loss.

The two teams battled back and forth in game two before the Wildcats evened the match at one all, winning the set on back-to-back points. Senior Liz Wegner led the team with six kills in game two, while freshman Jami Sleichter added a team-high four digs.

After numerous ties and lead changes, the Buffaloes scored back-to-back kills on the Cats in a 30-28 third game victory. The Wildcats would get four kills apiece from senior Jayne Christen and sophomores Lauren Gochring and Jensen as Colorado looked to finish the Cats off going into game four.

Colorado jumped out to a 6-2 lead in the fourth game but the Cats stormed back to tie, before eventually taking the lead at 14-13.

K-State extended their lead to four points before the Buffaloes rallied to take a late 28-26 lead. K-State tied the game at 28 and then scored giving them game point at 29-28.

Colorado retaliated and ended the match against K-State by winning 31-29 in the final game.

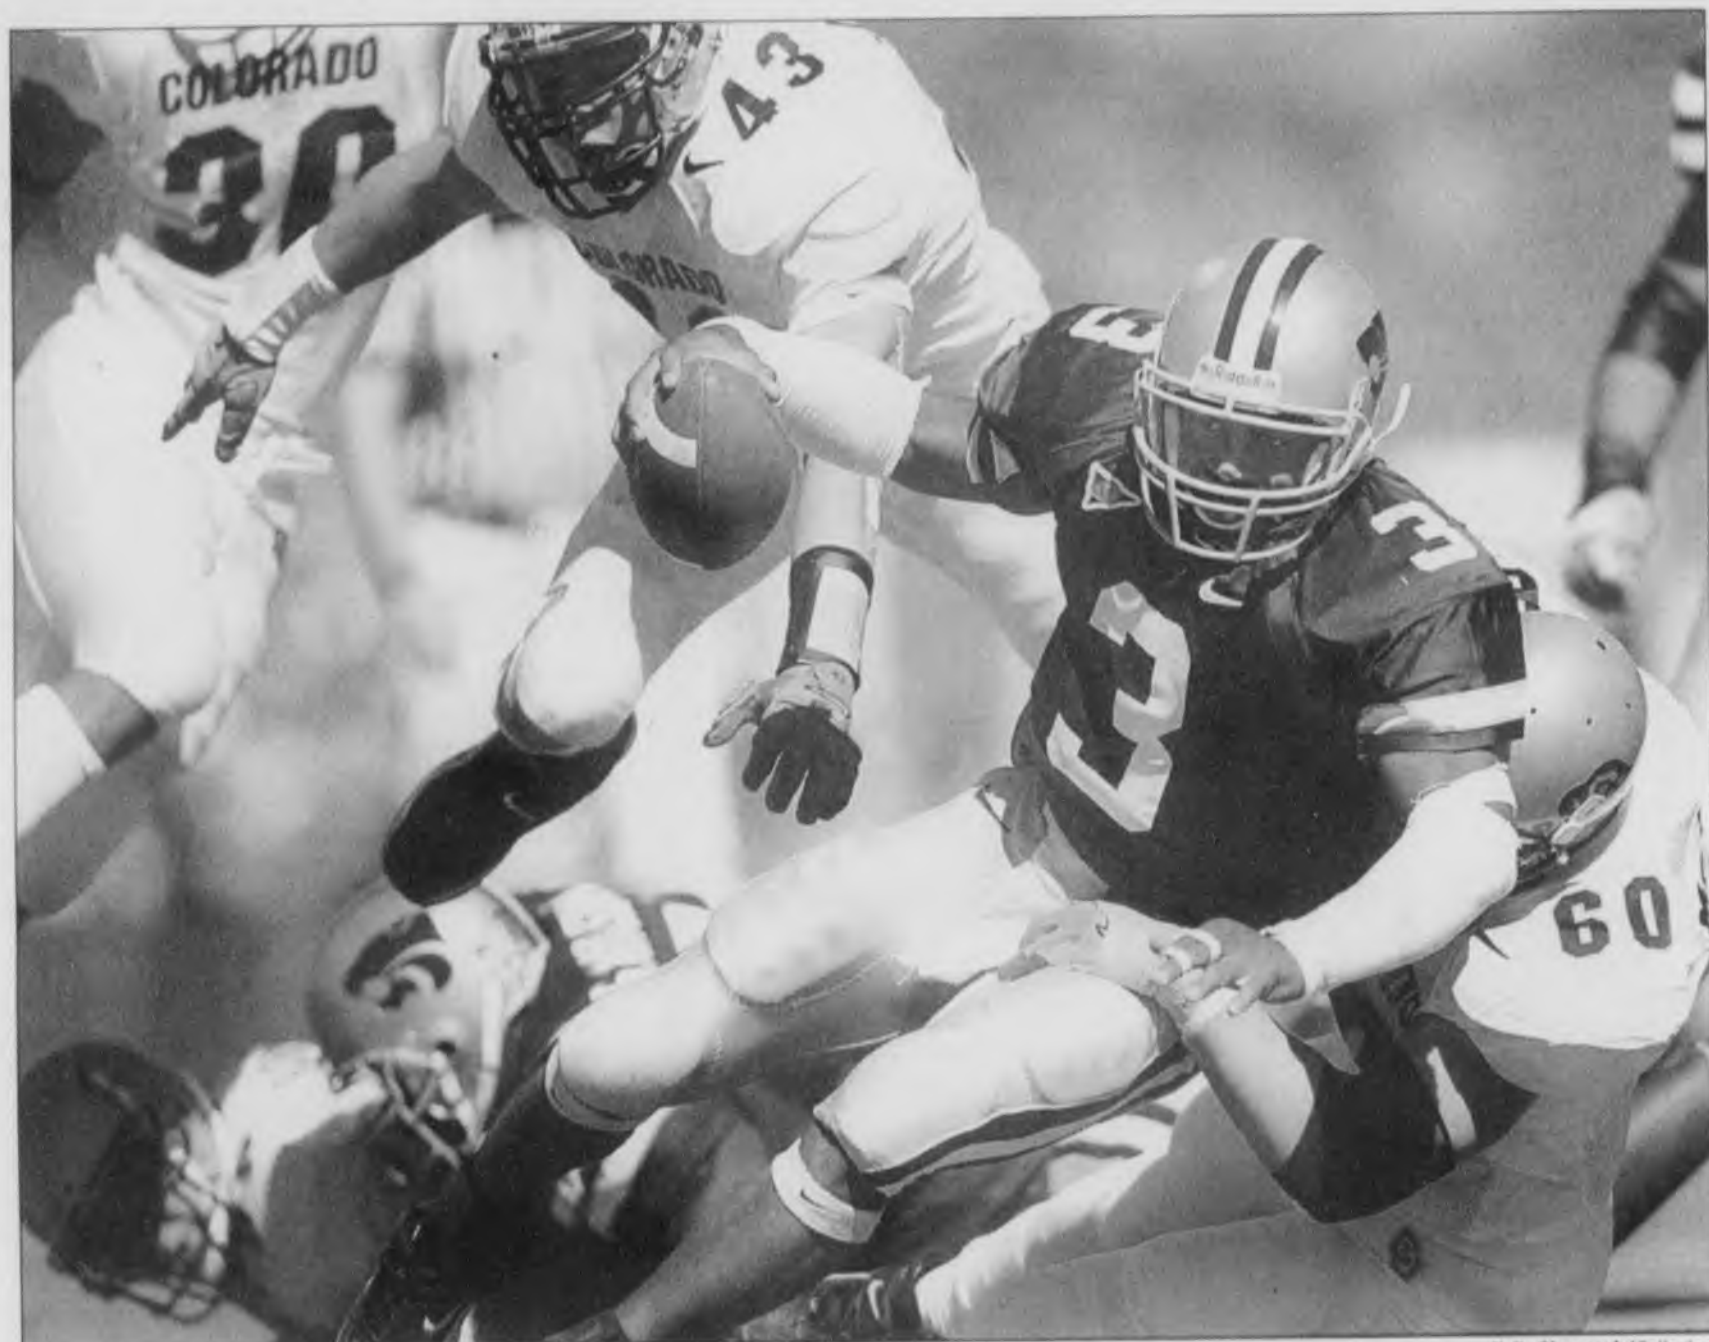

Jensen led the Wildcats with a season-best 13 kills on .323 hitting, playing in front of several friends and family members. Russell led four Buffaloes in double-digit kills with 22 to go along with 17 digs. Sophomore Monique Gerlach added 15 kills and 18 digs for Colorado.

K-State continues its two-match road trip Wednesday, as the Wildcats face Iowa State (3-8, 0-6 Big 12) at Hilton Coliseum in Ames, Iowa. The Cyclones lead the all-time series, 33-25; however, the Cats have a 10-match winning streak over Iowa State.

Cats stumble in various phases against Colorado

BY DAN SMITH
Kansas State Collegian

Even before K-State's 16-6 loss to Colorado on Saturday afternoon at Wagner Field was official, a hushed crowd started filing out of KSU Stadium wondering what went wrong.

At least one person at the game had an answer to that question.

"We self-destructed in several areas, and I thought they did a nice job," head coach Bill Snyder said.

In a game that saw quarterback Eli Roberson sacked six times and the Buffaloes running game register 196 yards — nearly twice what K-State averaged coming in — it was a game of extremes, Snyder said.

"I thought it was an inspired performance, and I thought defensively, they played extremely well."

So well, in fact, that K-State mustered just 196 yards of total offense one week after a 446-yard day a week before against third-ranked Oklahoma.

Offensive coordinator Ron Hudson said his unit's struggles were a result of Colorado's extended preparation for K-State.

"I thought they overplayed us on the outside with numbers, and we struggled because they presented some pictures to us that we hadn't seen before. And they had two weeks to prepare for us, so they had a good plan," he said.

"We're just inches away," Hudson said. "We just couldn't get it done, and we've got to get it rectified."

That seemed to be the dominant theme after the game as players and coaches alike attempted to explain the letdown.

"There's so many little things that you could maybe blame it on," senior linebacker Ben Leber said.

Sophomore linebacker Terry Pierce misses a tackle on Colorado's Chris Brown during K-State's 16-6 loss Saturday to the Buffaloes. Brown had 114 yards rushing in the game.

Buffaloes stop Roberson, stall K-State offense

BY DEREK BOSS
Kansas State Collegian

Colorado head coach Gary Barnett characterized his defensive game plan against K-State in three blunt words.

Stop Eli Roberson.

The Cat sophomore, ranked third among quarterbacks nationally in rushing (81.0 ypg) prior to Saturday's game, had already topped 100 yards in two of K-State's three games this season, including 115 on 23 carries at No. 3 Oklahoma last weekend.

And Barnett didn't want his Buffaloes to be another statistic.

"That's what we said we had to do," Barnett said. "We went in and said we're going to take the quarterback out of this game. And if we're not going to win it, it's going to be because Josh Scobey beats us or they hit the pass, but we were not going to let Roberson beat us.

"So that's what our plan was — a lot of people plan that — but you've got to execute."

The Buffaloes' defense did that.

Roberson was stymied by the Colorado front seven, managing 45 rushing yards and K-State's lone touchdown. Then, factor in 51 yards in losses — primarily from CU's six sacks — and the sophomore totaled negative six net rushing yards.

The problem was, after the Buffaloes' defense took away Roberson as a run threat, no other aspect of K-State's offense seemed to step to the forefront.

Scobey, who, along with Roberson, had posted two 100-yard games on the ground this season, was limited to 33 yards on 10 carries as the Cats' option game never formulated.

Redshirt freshman defensive tackle Brandon Dabdoub said run defense always has been a focus at Colorado, and if the Buffaloes could shut down not only Roberson but Scobey as well, victory would be in their hands.

"If we neutralized them two, we knew we were going to win the game," Dabdoub said. "Our whole objective was to stop the run — we knew they weren't a passing team. They just try to run it down your throat."

"Oklahoma couldn't do that, and they ran all over Oklahoma, but as you can see, we stopped the run and got the victory."

Even when K-State turned to the pass, though, the CU defense had an answer as Roberson completed just 10 of 29 attempts for 107 yards and two interceptions.

The sophomore was pressured all day in the pocket by the Buffaloes, led by defensive end Mark McChesney and the blitzing of strong safety Michael Lewis, as each recorded two sacks against Roberson.

Head coach Bill Snyder said many people are responsible for the less-than-positive aspects of Saturday's game, and Roberson shouldn't shoulder all the blame

FOOTBALL WEEKEND WRAPUP

TEXAS (5) 3
Quarterback Nate Hybl's injury wasn't enough to keep the Sooners from repeating their Southwestern Bell Cotton Bowl dominance over the Longhorns on Saturday. Oklahoma was nearly perfect on defense, led by safety Roy Williams. It was the first time both teams were ranked in the top five since 1984.

IOWA STATE 14
NEBRASKA (4) 48
Huskers' quarterback Eric Crouch set an NCAA Division IA record for rushing touchdowns by a quarterback Saturday with four scores against the Cyclones. Crouch also set a Nebraska record for rushing touchdowns with his 50th in the second quarter.

BAYLOR 10
TEXAS A&M (22) 16
Texas A&M used a gritty comeback and defensive toughness to claw back from an early 10-3 deficit and keep off Baylor in the second half. The Aggies still are perfect in the fourth quarter, allowing zero points in final frame. The loss was the Bears' 23rd straight in conference.

MISSOURI 41
OKLAHOMA STATE 38
Sixty minutes of football weren't enough in Stillwater, Okla., as the Tigers and Cowboys tangled for three overtimes before Missouri's Brad Hammerich's fourth field goal of the game broke the tie and gave the Tigers their first win of the season in the Big 12.

KANSAS 34
TEXAS TECH 31
Jayhawk quarterback Mario Kinsey came off the KU bench and threw a five-yard touchdown pass and handed off to running back Termaine Fulton on the ensuing two-point conversion to send the game to overtime. Freshman kicker Johnny Beck kicked the game-winning field goal in the second overtime.

LOSS

But the largest factor in K-State's loss was the ineffectiveness of the Cat offense, Roberson said.

"As an offensive unit, we struggled a lot today. I wouldn't say we underestimated Colorado, but we didn't have the fire in our eyes that we did against OU," he said. "That's something that we, as a unit, have to get, and we just gotta go out there and perform better than we did today."

Roberson completed just 10 of 29 attempts for 107 yards and threw two interceptions in what Snyder described as a step back for the young quarterback after a masterful day in Norman, Okla., just a week ago.

Colorado defensive end Matt McChesney, who had two of the Buffs' six sacks on the afternoon, described the K-State offense, and Roberson's performance in particular, in a different light.

"We came out and popped them in the mouth right off the bat," he said. "Coach Wilson has been harping on me to get to the quarterback more, and I took it upon myself today to try to get him more and work on my bowl rush and everything else. It worked really good."

Fellow defensive end Tyler Brayton also had a pair of sacks, further illustrating Colorado's dominance on the line, senior wideout Aaron Lockett said.

"We had trouble protecting today and having the ball to throw the ball the way we wanted to," he said.

"They put themselves in a situation where they were able to capitalize. That right there kind of limited our offense the whole day."

Lockett was kept to just two receptions on the day, just a small part of the game plan that Colorado head coach Gary Barnett said was carried out brilliantly against K-State.

"We believed in each other. Our defense was relentless," he said. "We did such a great job of shutting down the deep ball and taking away the option. Our defense was incredible out there."

Losers of its first two conference games for the first time since 1992, Snyder said his team's focus now shifts from national goals to a return to the basics in order to fix some of the more glaring errors and mental lapses demonstrated Saturday.

"Every player in our program probably had some ideas about what they would have liked to accomplish," he said.

"I heard one youngster quoted that his goal was to win a national championship, and I'm sure that is in a lot of people's minds, or was. But my goals have always been the same — I just want this football team to get better."

"You don't give up on players," Snyder said. "You don't give up on your program. You don't give up on anything. I've been there. It's important how they respond to this and that they remember the perseverance pays off."

for the lack of offensive production.

"There's a lot of reasons why a guy gets sacked, and it's not always the quarterback — probably more often than not it isn't."

"He was under duress all day and that really hasn't been the nature of this football team. No excuses — we didn't protect the way we should."

Yet, Roberson preferred to bear the criticism.

"I, myself, was flat," Roberson said, "and that's just something we can't have."

It seemed the rest of the offense was flat as well.

Colorado's defense allowed just 197 yards of total offense against K-State — less than half of its season average of 446.7 yards per game — and a meager 16 yards in the third quarter alone.

Meanwhile, the Cats' No. 4 rushing offense nationally (268.7 ypg) was limited to 74 ground yards as the Buffs' defense charted 15 tackles for losses totaling 67 yards.

In the first half, K-State ran 12 plays in CU territory for a total of 26 yards and no first downs, with two drives starting on the plus-side of the 50 ending in interceptions.

Not to mention the Buffaloes were playing without All-American, Butkus and Lombardi Award candidate Jashon Sykes, who missed the game due to injury.

Roberson said it's just one of those games a team has to forget about and move on. After all, K-State has six games left on its schedule, and the season is far from over.

"We came out and flat threw an egg, but shit happens like that, so we've just got to get better and come out this week and perform," Roberson said.

"Colorado just came out to play. They showed it, they came after us, and we folded as an offense. We just can't have that, and you won't see it again."

Emmy Awards ceremony canceled

BY LYNN ELBER
The Associated Press

LOS ANGELES — The Emmy Awards telecast, delayed three weeks by the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks, was canceled Sunday after United States and Britain launched a military attack in Afghanistan.

It was the first cancellation in the awards' 53-year history.

There was no immediate statement from the Academy of Television Arts & Sciences, which presents the awards.

CBS spokeswoman Susan Marks, who announced the cancellation, did not elaborate on the network's decision.

The ceremony had been scheduled to begin at 7 p.m.

The television industry had grappled in the weeks following the attack with the propriety of having a celebration such as the Emmys.

The Recording Academy canceled its 2nd Annual Latin Grammys show Sept. 11.

Emmy organizers had sought to create a night of muted celebration, asking participants to cut back on red-carpet arrival fanfare and forgo showy gowns and tuxedos in favor of business attire.

Veteran newsman Walter Cronkite was invited to help set a serious tone. The ceremony on CBS, with master of ceremonies Ellen DeGeneres, was to include tributes to heroes and victims of the attacks on New York and Washington, D.C.

In deference to East Coast-based nominees, part of the presentation of 27 awards was to take place in a Manhattan studio. The bicoastal Emmy broadcast was the first in more than two decades.

HBO's mob drama "The Sopranos" had bids in seven categories, while NBC's White House drama "The West Wing" had six nominations. Both were up for best drama series honors.

"The Sopranos" grabbed the most nominations in July, a total of 22, to 18 bids for "The West Wing." But after September's creative arts ceremony, the NBC series had four Emmys in hand to one for "The Sopranos."

In last month's creative arts ceremony, awards were announced in categories including outstanding choreography, editing and makeup, and in the new reality series categories.

NBC and Fox received a leading 11 awards, followed by HBO with eight, ABC with seven, and CBS, PBS and UPN with three each.

"Survivor," the CBS program whose success helped spur the reality series craze in America, was honored as best among programs in which the show's participants competed for a prize.

"American High," a documentary series about high school students that was dropped by Fox and picked up by PBS, received an Emmy for best reality program that didn't involve a competition.

Four acting awards for guest roles were given out. The winners were Derek Jacobi and Jean Smart for episodes of "Frasier," Michael Emerson for "The Practice" and Sally Field for "ER."

For best commercial, the award went to PBS' "Photo Booth" spot.

Bush addresses nation at memorial service

BY SCOTT LINDLAW
The Associated Press

WASHINGTON, D.C. — President Bush spent Sunday watching military developments in Afghanistan, shuttling between his White House residence and the Oval Office and meeting with top aides after his midday address informing the nation of the U.S. operation.

"I gave them fair warning," Bush told his spokesman, Ari Fleischer, in the Oval Office shortly after returning to the White House, referring to the Taliban rulers in Afghanistan and their refusal to hand over suspected terrorist Osama bin Laden. Aides described the president as resolute.

Bush awoke at Camp David and flew to neighboring Emmitsburg, Md., where he addressed the National Fallen Firefighters Memorial service.

The gathering was in honor of the 99 firefighters killed in the line of duty last year, and two who died previously.

But the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks, and the impending U.S. response, loomed large.

Bush ignored reporters' questions about a Taliban proposal to detain bin Laden and try him under Islamic law — an 11th-hour bid to avoid possible U.S. military retaliation.

By then, American and British forces already were mobilizing for their attack.

In Emmitsburg, Bush honored the fallen firefighters and paid tribute to the more than 300 New York City firefighters presumed dead in the rubble of the World Trade Center.

We're kicking over the competition!

Serendipity

When fate takes over...

Movie fails to free itself from sappy, romantic genre, lacks believability

Another sappy love story. In true Hollywood form, "Serendipity" tells the story of love that transcends reality and common sense.

John Cusack ("High Fidelity") is Jonathan Trager, a man who meets a mysterious woman (Kate Beckinsale, "Pearl Harbor") one night in New York. They share a magical night of romance, but when Trager prepares to give Cusack her phone number at the end of it, it is blown away by the wind.

Being a believer in fate, the woman, who later reveals herself as Sara, writes her number in a book and says she will sell it to a used bookstore. If Jonathan finds it, they were meant to be together.

Five years later, Jonathan is engaged to be married, as is Sara. They both have their respective sidekicks of the same gender in Jeremy Piven ("The Family Man") and Molly Shannon (better known as naughty Catholic schoolgirl Mary Katherine Gallagher on "Saturday Night Live").

Both find they still are infatuated with each other and not satisfied with their own lives. So begins a wild goosechase to reunite the lovers to whom fate has dealt a harsh blow.

While the acting is decent, Beckinsale and Cusack can do so much better with their characters. Piven and Shannon, meanwhile, aren't given big enough roles or enough character development.

Nearly every element of this movie is completely ridiculous and unrealistic. Jonathan and Sara put their entire lives and reputations in jeopardy by actively looking for each other.

They spent only one night together five years ago, and it is extremely hard to believe the night was so memorable and special that they are willing to put their current relationships on the line for that one evening of magic.

This romantic, attractive idea that fate plays a hand in determining our relationships and loves has been played out to the fullest extent in other movies.

Now, rather than being a new, wonderful concept, the idea of fate and destiny controlling romance simply is used as a last-ditch effort to revive the plots of the number of romantic comedies that are dominating the market.

Strong acting, good plot creates pure enjoyment

Once again, Anthony Hopkins has made his mark in an age where superb acting and plots are sacrificed for toilet humor.

Hopkins (better known as the wonderfully detestable villain Hannibal Lecter in 1991's "Silence of the Lambs" and this year's sequel, "Hannibal") stars as Ted Brautigan, a mysterious wandering traveler who befriends 11-year-old Bobby Garfield (Anton Yelchim, "Delivering Milo").

The movie spans one summer in the 1950s when the McCarthy witch hunts were in full swing, and Brautigan is being hunted by the government as a psychic who is believed to be giving aid to Soviet spies. Bobby learns life lessons and taps into a hidden psychic gift through his new friend.

Based on the short story by William Goldman ("The Princess Bride") in the novel by Stephen King ("Misery," "The Green Mile"), the characters are strong and fully developed, and the cinematography is first-rate. Bobby's flashback scenes are powerfully haunting as the viewer gets only a quick glimpse of a face and a blur of an action.

Hopkins isn't the only star in this cinematic masterpiece, though. Both Yelchim and Mika Boreem ("Along Came a Spider") as Carol, his girlfriend, come off as very mature for their age, and Hope Davis ("Arlington Road") gives a spectacular performance as Bobby's tragic, negligent mother.

The subplots are numerous, but easy to follow. Bobby's budding romance with Carol, the inner and outer struggles of Bobby's widowed mother, Bobby's discovery of his father's past and the hunt for Brautigan by the U.S. government all make for lively, insightful conversation between Brautigan and Bobby. The two are very different people in a doomed friendship.

You just can't go wrong with this film. Award-winning writers and actors make this movie memorable, and the tale, while poignant and heartbreaking, also contributes an element of mystery that will keep the audience guessing, one viewing after another.

MOVIE REVIEW BY CORBIN H. CRABLE

Honesty, greed fabricate nontraditional cop movie

Breaking out of his conventional good-guy roles, Denzel Washington steals the show in "Training Day."

The movie tells the tale of rookie LAPD cop Jake Hoyt (Ethan Hawke, "Gattaca," "Great Expectations") who suddenly is thrust into action when he begins training as a narcotics officer. Hoyt's mentor, veteran cop Alonzo Harris (Denzel Washington, "Remember the Titans," "Philadelphia"), fills the role of the villain quite nicely.

The chemistry between Hawke and Washington is amazing, and the tension between the two characters as they develop makes the movie all the more thrilling.

While Hawke fills his role with ease, the spotlight belongs to Washington. His villainous character is a far cry from his previous good guys in movies like "Bone Collector," and Washington makes him believable.

This definitely isn't your regular good cop/bad cop movie. The juxtaposition of Hawke's young, honest cop with Washington's more experienced, greedy cop is the focus of the film.

Cameos by Dr. Dre, Snoop Dogg and Macy Gray add even more personality to the movie and ensure that the surprises never stop. The action plays right into the plot as well. Such action, as is characteristic with many of Washington's films, makes sure the audience is never bored. The plot never slows down. It moves with the action, a feat that is rare in any film today.

Those who want a break from the same old cop movies will find "Training Day" a treat. Both the acting and the action work together well, and one hardly ever detracts from the other. "Training Day" is yet another great move for Washington, and hopefully, it will solidify Hawke's career.

"... Is there no balm in Gilead; is there no physician there? Why then is not the health of the daughter of my people recovered? Oh, that my head were waters, and mine eyes a fountain of tears, that I might weep day and night for the slain of the daughter of my people!"
— Jeremiah 8:18-9:1

There are not enough tears to cry for the losses the United States suffered Sept. 11, said the Rev. James Reese, executive presbyter for New York City.

But there still is healing. Members of the First Presbyterian Church gathered Sunday to listen to Reese give his sermon, "There is a Balm in Gilead."

Reese was invited by the Manhattan church to speak about the terrorist attacks and its effects.

The nation has been terrorized, Reese said, but it has not been defeated.

"We cannot cry enough tears," he said. "How do we cry enough tears for the 4,000 people who have died? How do we cry enough tears for the thousands of people in the hospitals?"

"Maybe if our heads were full of water, then there would be enough tears."

After the attacks, people reached out in a way Reese said he never had seen. A man he worked with had just begun a five-mile walk home when a woman he didn't know stopped and gave him a ride.

These random acts of kindness have become the norm — not the unusual.

"In tragedy, we have found that we have a common ground," he said.

"There's been a wealth of help and support from people. Everyone wants to do something."

After the attacks, church attendance also increased. The Sunday following Sept. 11, there was about a 40 percent increase, Reese said.

"And it's continued to be higher," he said.

Reese also has coordinated and responded to the dozens of donations, phone calls and e-mails offering support, and he has given several guest sermons around the country.

Through everything that has happened, Reese said he has one hope.

"That we have a positive understanding of people, regardless of religion, race or gender and can find a way to be in relationships with each other."

"If people don't like each other, then why don't they like each other?"

People of the world should keep the brotherhood this tragedy has brought about, Reese said.

"If we can hold onto this good and support each other and be in relationships with each other, then the deaths won't have to be in vain," he said.

Coming Out Week to help gay visibility

BY TARA PATTY
Kansas State Collegian

In honor of National Coming Out Day, the Queer Straight Alliance is sponsoring its events related to National Coming Out Week, today through Friday.

Weeklong events include a SHAPE presentation and a discussion with Pastor Jayne Thompson, of Lutheran Campus Ministries, on faith and accepting sexual diversity.

The event usually is well-attended, said Christina Hauck, GSA adviser.

"We take serious our allies to come and show support and provide a safe place for young, gay people to come out," Hauck said.

Hauck said the general public seems to have reached a consensus on the gay community. She said the overall view from people is that it is OK to be gay, but they don't want to be told about it.

Hauck said this mentality leads to the hatred of gays, which is a threat to the gay community.

"People can pretend they don't know anyone who is gay, but that can lead to hatred of gays. And that is dangerous to us because we can't be visible," Hauck said.

Tobacco company works to produce safer cigarette

WINSTON-SALEM, N.C. — A tobacco company has begun producing a cigarette it says has fewer cancer-causing ingredients.

The new Omni cigarette brand, made by Durham-based Vector Tobacco, is expected to arrive in retail stores later this month. The cigarettes are made with a chemical treatment that the company says reduces certain cancer-causing elements in cigarette smoke.

A second product, Omni Free, will come out next year using the treatment, plus a new type of tobacco genetically engineered to contain virtually no nicotine.

Vector Tobacco, owned by Miami-based Vector Group Ltd., is a sister company to the Liggett Group Inc., the smallest of the major tobacco companies. Liggett, based in Mebane, was the first cigarette-maker to break ranks with the industry and settle lawsuits brought by state attorneys general. Cancer-causing chemicals still would be present in the new cigarettes, Vector Group's chairman and chief executive officer said earlier this year.

"While there is no such thing as a safe cigarette, we believe we've eliminated what the health community considers to be the most serious cancer causing agents," Bennett LeBow said.

Health officials and industry analysts have been skeptical.

"None of the medical authorities, to my knowledge, have said, 'If we take out X or Y, we have a safe cigarette,'" said John C. Maxwell, an independent tobacco industry analyst.

The company is investing about $100 million in what it calls its less hazardous smoking products, and Vector Group's stock has climbed about 200 percent this year.

Credit education might stop enticement

BY DANA STRONGIN
Kansas State Collegian

College students face a virtual smorgasbord of new challenges, and proper use of credit cards is one of the most important.

Student credit card users must learn how to handle their purchases or face the consequence: debt.

In 2000, out of the 78 percent of undergraduates who had credit cards, the average debt was $2,748, said Nellie Mae, a financial organization that does student loans, finances and services. Ten percent of students had over $7,000 in debt.

K-State students often need legal consultation for their debts, said Dianne Urban, attorney for Legal Services for Students.

Urban said students often do not seem truly to understand the way credit works.

"I get the feeling they don't realize how much interest rates are going to be. They should look at that while getting a credit card," she said.

Students seem to be living off their cards, Urban said.

"I think most of the students I see are desperately in need of money for essential things — food, clothing, shelter and books," she said.

Urban said this sort of behavior can get card users into trouble.

"A lot of students have big medical bills, but they don't have health insurance," she said. "They try to make do with credit cards, but this can get them into a mess."

Students can prevent financial trouble by taking several preventative measures, said Kristin Brumm, division manager for Consumer Credit Counseling Services. Brumm said she has advice for first-time card users.

"For your first card, get one with a small credit limit. Remember, too, that it doesn't mean that a person can afford to spend up to that limit," she said. "Know in advance if you can afford to pay it off."

Brumm said people need to

Tips for credit card use

Some important tips for wise credit card use from Kristin Brumm, division manager for Consumer Credit Counseling Services:

1. Before signing a contract, make sure you understand all the terms including interest rates, annual fees and the credit limit.
2. Always make more than your minimum payment. It is best to pay your balance in full each month.
3. If you have more than one card, pay off the higher-interest balance first.
4. Read your statements each month.
5. If you are in over your head, call your creditors and let them know your situation. Make good faith payments, even if you can't pay the entire amount due.
6. If you need help, contact Consumer Credit Counseling Services. A credit counselor can sit down with you and go over your bills. He or she can tell you your options and, in many cases, set you up on an affordable repayment plan. There are a number of offices, including one in Manhattan. All offices can be reached at 1-800-383-0217.

understand what credit cards really are.

"Credit is not free money," she said. "If you don't pay your bill each month, you will be paying interest on your charges."

For those who do not pay their bills on time, Brumm said, interest causes the owner of the card to pay more than actual prices of items.

Brumm said a person with $10,000 debt at an interest rate of 21.5 percent can pay the minimum payment each month and barely make progress paying off the debt. This person will pay $2,400 over a year, but only $250 will go toward the original debt. The rest will go toward interest.

A key to wise credit use is understanding the terms, Brumm said.

"A credit card application, once signed, is a contract, and it is important that one is aware of the details of that contract," she said.

There are a number of questions a student can ask, Brumm said. Before signing a contract, a person should know the amount of the interest rate, if there is an annual fee and the amount of the credit limit.

Students can ask what penalties exist for those who exceed the credit limit.

Students also should be aware of changes in rates, Brumm said. They can inquire about introductory versus permanent rates.

"Often companies have teaser rates, which are low for the first few months and then jump up later," she said.

Making a budget helps students know how much they can afford to spend each month, Brumm said.

Credit cards are something students frequently have to face. Hank Moyers, senior in landscape architecture, said his roommates get calls all the time.

"They get hassled," he said. "The companies want them to upgrade or want their personal card information."

Sometimes students choose not to sign up for cards. Moyers said he does not have a card.

"I don't want to deal with it. They target college students," he said. "I don't think I have personal use for one right now."

Urban said the easiest method to avoid debt is not to use credit cards at all.

"It's the best way, but I imagine they are in a bind," she said.

Brumm said credit cards can be useful.

"Credit cards are not evil," she said.

"They can help you handle emergencies or reserve cars and airline tickets. They can help you to establish a good credit record. But, it is imperative that credit is managed wisely."

$1.5 million Dow Chemical partnership establishes multicultural scholarship fund

BY COLBY GORDON
Kansas State Collegian

The Dow Chemical company announced Friday a commitment of $1.5 million to the KSU Foundation to establish the Dow/KSU Diversity Partnership.

The partnership will fund scholarships for multicultural students in the colleges of Engineering and Business Administration as well as provide resources for numerous multicultural initiatives.

The partnership was announced at a news conference in the K-State Student Union and was attended by many top Dow officials, who came from Midland, Mich., as well as members of K-State administration.

"Dow has funded multicultural scholarships and programs in K-State's College of Engineering since 1999," said Dow Executive Vice President Arnold Allemang.

"Now we are very pleased to establish a comprehensive diversity partnership with K-State that supports scholarships and program initiatives in three colleges and several other areas."

President Jon Wefald, one of the speakers at the event, said he was excited about the new partnership and that it was significant because diversity is of central importance to the university.

"Supporting a broad base of diversity initiatives is key to our commitment to prepare our students to be productive citizens in an increasingly diverse society. We are very grateful for Dow's generous support of this partnership," Wefald said.

The partnership also provides funding to the Dow Multicultural Resource Center in Hale Library and K-State's office of diversity.

Chris Hernandez, senior in electrical engineering, spoke on behalf of the many scholarship recipients who were on hand. Hernandez thanked everyone from Dow and said his scholarship was a great victory for him and his family.

"I can't even put in words what this scholarship has done for me," Hernandez said. "Having had this scholarship will put me off on the right foot."

Targets struck by American and British forces

Attack facts

- The allies directed attacks on various Afghanistan targets were directed at early warning radars, surface-to-air missiles, airfields, aircraft, military command and control installations and terrorist camps.
- Allies plan on dropping 37,500 sets of supply rations in Afghanistan for aid purposes.
- Attacks expected to continue for several days.
- U.S. attack planes come under fire, but are not hit.
- U.S. and British forces call new attack Enduring Freedom.
- U.S. government heightens security as Bush and Cheney are moved to separate locations.
- Some protests take place, but fans cheer at stadiums across the country for the response. Chants of U.S.A., U.S.A., break out in Atlanta's Georgia Dome.

Securing U.S. from terrorism big task

BY JERRY SCHWARTZ
The Associated Press

You are Tom Ridge. Your job is to ensure that our homeland is secure from terrorism.

This is what you must protect: Almost 600,000 bridges, 170,000 water systems, more than 2,800 power plants (104 of them nuclear), 190,000 miles of interstate pipelines for natural gas, 463 skyscrapers (each more than 500 feet tall), nearly 20,000 miles of border, airports, stadiums, train tracks, the food supply, schools and industry.

More than 285 million people, spread out over 3,717,792 square miles.

"If you start out defending the homeland with the premise that you're going to defend every high profile, highly vulnerable target — you lose," said Donald Hamilton, deputy director of the Memorial Institute for the Prevention of Terrorism, in Oklahoma City.

"If you can't fill a yellow legal pad with hard-to-define targets in 30 minutes, you're not thinking very hard. Oil pipelines, the Holland and Lincoln tunnels, the food supply ... you could sink the whole national budget into trying to defend these things very quickly."

But this is not to say that Ridge — the former Pennsylvania governor who takes charge today as the first head of the Office of Homeland Security — is on a fool's errand.

Experts on terrorism and domestic security say the new department can accomplish a lot. It can coordinate the agencies already at work against terrorism; it can focus public attention on what needs to be done.

And most likely, it will lead the way to a less defensive approach to protecting Americans on these shores.

This will not be the old idea of civil defense — the one that sent New York Mayor Fiorello LaGuardia running around the country, warning of air raids in the days before World War II; the one that featured an animated creature, Burt the Turtle, telling children to "duck and cover" in the event of nuclear attack in 1950.

Nor are we likely to hear instructions on how to dig our way to safety from nuclear attack, as we did early in the Reagan administration.

Ridge can be an advocate for the funds and resources needed to face the threat.

The FBI has long sought more translators; now, the urgency is apparent.

Ridge can help recruit the brainpower needed to make America secure, perhaps turning to a technology industry that has been ravaged by the downturn.

Statehouse security on vigilant alert after strikes

BY STEVE BRISENDINE
The Associated Press

Security at the state capitol increased as the United States began air strikes in Afghanistan, but for many Kansans, Sunday was just like any other autumn day.

The officers that patrol state office buildings in Topeka were told Sunday to be extra vigilant and to focus their efforts on the Statehouse and downtown buildings, said Capt. Ray Gonzalez, troop commander for the Capitol Police.

"You never know," Gonzalez said. "We are in the Midwest here, but things can happen anywhere in the world."

Many state agencies already were operating at a heightened state of security and did not make additional changes Sunday.

LaTricia Harper, public information officer for the city of Wichita, said the airport public safety division is continuously reviewing the situation on its own and also would be watching for any directives or recommendations from the FAA.

Timeline of events

Oct. 6

Taliban gunners in Afghanistan's capital unleash a thunderous barrage at a plane cruising high over Kabul on Saturday as President Bush delivers a stern warning that time is running out for the regime to hand over Osama bin Laden.

The Taliban, meanwhile, defiantly repeats its vow to wage holy war against America and even threatens to invade neighboring Uzbekistan if the country participates in any U.S.-led attack.

The regime offers to release eight aid workers, including two Americans, if Washington, D.C. stops its threats and begins negotiations, but the White House rejects the offer.

"The Taliban has been given the opportunity to surrender all the terrorists in Afghanistan and to close down their camps and operations," Bush says Saturday in a radio address. "Full warning has been given, and time is running out."

"We have deployed our forces there at all important places. This is the question of our honor, and we will never bow before the Americans," says a Taliban defense ministry source, quoted Sunday by the independent Afghan Islamic Press, which has connections to the Kabul regime.

7:19 a.m.

The Taliban says it is willing to detain bin Laden and try him under Islamic law if the United States formally requests.

"Under Islamic law, we can put him on trial according to allegations raised against him and then the evidence would be provided to the court," ambassador Abdul Salam Zaeef says. "It is up to them to come to us. It is their problem," he said referring to the United States.

11:27 a.m.

Thunderous explosions, anti-aircraft fire is heard in the Afghan capital of Kabul. Electricity is cut throughout the city. Five large explosions shake the city, followed by the sounds of anti-aircraft fire. There is no indication of what caused the blasts, which appear to have been in the southwest area of the city.

11:55 a.m.

Bush spokesman Ari Fleischer explains the explosions to CNN. "We are beginning another front in our war against terrorism so freedom can prevail over fear," he says as the United States launches military retaliation in Afghanistan. Bush prepares to address the nation.

Noon

President Bush addresses the nation, saying, "Now the Taliban will pay a price."

12:37 p.m.

A Taliban diplomat says "we are ready for jihad," or holy war. "We condemn this attack," Rehmatullah Kakazada, the Taliban's consul-general in Karachi, Pakistan, tells The Associated Press by phone. "We have received word that a plane has bombed Kabul. We don't have any more information. We are ready for jihad."

1:02 p.m.

Prime Minister Tony Blair says Sunday that British missile-firing submarines are taking part in operations against Afghanistan. Blair says the submarines have joined in a U.S.-led attack on Taliban military facilities and forces in Afghanistan at the request of Washington. He says British warplanes will join the attack in the next few days.

1:04 p.m.

The Taliban declares U.S. and British strikes "terrorist attacks" and says America will never achieve its goals.

1:25 p.m.

Bin Laden says war against Afghanistan and him is a "war on Islam," according to a video released by Arab TV station and apparently made before strikes began.

Bin Laden praises God for the terrorist attacks that toppled the World Trade Center and damaged the Pentagon.

"America was hit by God in one of its softest spots," bin Laden said. "America is full of fear from its north to its south, from its west to its east. Thank God for that."

"When the sword falls on the United States, they cry for their children and they cry for their people. The least you can say about these people is that they are sinners. They have helped evil triumph over good."

1:44 p.m.

Ambassador Zaeef says bin Laden and the Taliban leader Mullah Mohammed Omar survived the initial wave of attacks.

3:02 p.m.

NATO is informed in advance of Sunday's U.S. and British strikes on Afghanistan, but the alliance is not directly involved in the action, officials say. They also decline to give further details and say no formal statement is expected from the alliance Sunday.

President Bush says in addition to Britain, fellow NATO allies Canada, Germany and France, as well as Australia, pledge forces "as the operation unfolds."

3:51 p.m.

Several influential Pakistani clerics call the attacks on Afghanistan late Sunday attacks against Islam and grounds for holy war. One organization summons Muslims to "extend full support to their Afghan brothers." The influential Afghan Defense Council, which is sympathetic to the Taliban, issues a call for holy war. An estimated 5,000 to 10,000 people attended the Multan rally where they burn an American flag and an effigy of President Bush.

4:29 p.m.

In Iran, Foreign Ministry spokesman Hamid-Reza Assefi call the attacks "unacceptable," saying they were launched "regardless of the world public opinion, especially the Muslim nations and will damage the innocent and oppressed Afghans." Assefi, quoted by the Iranian news agency, IRNA, cautions the United States to avoid Iranian air space.

5:21 p.m.

The Afghan opposition launches an assault on the ruling Taliban militia from an air force base just north of the capital. Northern alliance forces that control the Bagram air force base fire multiple-rocket launchers at the Taliban forces that control the surrounding mountains. The Taliban returns fire using Soviet-made BM-21 rockets.

5:30 p.m.

Afghanistan's former King Mohammad Zahir Shah, says Sunday he recognizes the "legitimate right" of the United States to pursue those responsible for the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks but urges that innocents be spared in the U.S. strikes on his homeland.

European governments give swift and solid backing to the U.S.-British attacks on Osama bin Laden and his backers Sunday with France saying its forces also will take part. Iran and Iraq protest the action in Afghanistan. Canadian Prime Minister Jean Chretien confirms that his country will meet Bush's request for a military contribution.

"I'm kind of torn. Today's attacks are just giving more fuel to the fire. If what Osama Bin Laden says is true, I believe there will be smaller attacks more often."

Christine Best,
sophomore in communications disorders

"This is ridiculous. It's provoking action even more. It's not right to justify violence with violence, and that is what we have done."

Mark Courtney, sophomore in architecture

"It's about time they took action. If we had waited longer, world support would have dwindled. People tend to forget their anger after awhile."

Justin Williams,

"I'm glad we're doing something and not just blowing off the terrorist attacks. I expected something, but I didn't expect 50 missiles."

Grant Cochenour,

"I give the U.S. my full support in their attacks against Afghanistan. Historically, appeasement has not been effective in stopping or halting this type of behavior, terrorism."

Area bar appeals
chargesBY DANA STRONGIN
Kansas State Collegian

Silverado Saloon was supposed to lose its liquor license Saturday morning, but the establishment will operate under a stay until Thursday.

The Kansas Department of Revenue Alcoholic Beverage Control Division recently called for the revocation of the liquor license of the bar, according to a press release from the Kansas Department of Revenue. The license was granted to The Hawkinson Company, Inc.

Silverado's was first notified Sept. 26 that the revocation was to take effect Sept. 28., said Pete Bodyk, operations officer for Alcoholic Beverage Control. The license then requested and received a week extension in order to prepare to appeal.

The Revenue Department Administrative Appeals Division responded to the license's appeal by granting a stay Friday.

Investigation of the establishment began about six months ago, Bodyk said.

"We have an agent who lives in Manhattan, and he gets to know the bars in the area," he said. "He asked the saloon about past and present ownership and looked through the company's records, which raised some flags."

The company is facing three accusations: hidden ownership interest, filing false or fraudulent information, and failure to meet the 30 percent food requirement.

The owner listed on the license is not the actual owner; therefore, the establishment is violating both ownership and application regulations, Bodyk said.

"They were using someone else as the owner on the license application for a sort of front man," Bodyk said.

The food requirement is based on a county-by-county basis. It requires establishments that sell alcohol to have sales of at least 30 percent in food, Bodyk said.

"Riley County has never been able to vote this rule out," Bodyk said.

Silverado is one of many dance clubs that has had trouble selling food, Bodyk said.

Bodyk said the club can continue to appeal, but once an establishment has its license revoked, it never can obtain one in Kansas and many other states again.

"A new license is possible if it is in the same location, carries the same name, but it has new owner and corporation," he said.

Members of Silverado Saloon management were not available for comment.

Members of Alpha Tau Omega fraternity were arrested early Sunday morning for illegally entering the Pi Beta Phi sorority house and stealing three undergarments.

Brandon Converse, Shane Frownfelter, Allan Sheahan, Curtis Mick and Kevin Hudson were arrested for aggravated burglary. They all were released on $5,000 bonds, except for Hudson, who also was arrested for DUI. His bond was $5,500.

Police responded to the scene at approximately 5 a.m. Sunday after one of the women called to report the disturbance. The three men had already fled the scene. One woman described the vehicle to the police, who tracked it down.

The undergarments, which were worth a total of $50, were recovered.

ATO president Lance Jones said the houses had been involved in a series of pranks against each other.

"We're doing our best to make sure this won't happen again," Jones said.

Attacks on Taliban continue

BY RON FOURNIER
The Associated Press

WASHINGTON, D.C. — The United States pounded terrorist targets in Afghanistan from the air for a second night Monday in an effort to undercut the Taliban militia sheltering Osama bin Laden. Anti-Taliban forces inside Afghanistan appeared ready to strike in concert with the American barrage.

As U.S. warplanes and naval forces unleashed assaults halfway around the world, the Bush administration raised its guard at home.

"We've learned that America is not immune from attack," President Bush said as he created an Office of Homeland Security and put former Pennsylvania Gov. Tom Ridge in charge.

The creation of an anti-terrorism office underscored America's heightened anxiety. The FBI said it was investigating the possibility that the anthrax bacteria detected in two Florida men was a result of terrorism or criminal action.

"Every American should be vigilant," Attorney General John Ashcroft said.

The Pentagon said five long-range bombers, 10 sea-launched warplanes and 15 Tomahawk cruise missiles struck an undisclosed number of targets, including early warning radars, Taliban ground forces and military command

U.S. officials said the military strikes, expected to continue at least another day, were designed to destroy terrorist camps and bolster opposition forces fighting the Taliban.

Dairy barn developed from EPA standards

BY ELIZABETH GRAHAM
Kansas State Collegian

More than 20 years of history was lost when the K-State Dairy Barn caught fire Oct. 2. In 1974, K-State approved the relocation of the Dairy Barn and its facilities to the current location north of Marlett Avenue between the swine and poultry units.

According to the original plan, construction was scheduled to begin in summer of 1975 and occupied by September 1976. A request for $785,500 was made from the state legislature.

The old Dairy Barn, built in 1933, wasn't considered feasible to renovate.

In 1974, C.L. Norton, head of the Department of Dairy and Poultry

Science, said the Dairy Barn located on Denison Avenue wasn't functional.

"The present barn isn't arranged well enough to enable us to get the most profit from the work we put into the operation," Norton said in a Collegian interview in 1974.

In the old Dairy Barn, hay was stored overhead. In order to feed, it had to be moved back downstairs. Norton said feeding on the same level would increase the level of the operation.

In 1974, Paul Young, vice president of university development, cited three reasons for the move. The instructional and research requirements had outgrown the present facilities; environmental problems, such as run-off, existed and the current waste disposal system was complicated.

The EPA passed strict regulations in September 1973, requiring all polluting feedlot runoff to be controlled. K-State would have had to build a manure settling pond and catch basin on university property to meet the standards, Norton said.

The move was not an expansion of space, but a change of location and update of equipment. The change added efficiency to feed and animal handling, he said.

The new facility was designed to be similar to the most modern dairies in the country in order to conduct research. The new facility had less square feet than the have to send a client deeper into poverty.

"We provide high-quality legal services for people living in poverty," said Gabrielle Thompson, managing attorney for Flint Hills Legal services. "As it should be for any social agency, we are helping to pull these people out of poverty."

At any given time, the staff of three attorneys and a paralegal has 200 to 300 cases open. She said the numbers sound misleading because some cases only require three hours of work whereas others require 50 hours.

The agency receives money primarily from government grants, she said, that specify what the money can be used for. For instance, some grants only will support cases benefiting families or the elderly.

Flint Hills Legal Services mostly deals with divorce and child custody disputes.

"We work hand-in-hand with the Crisis Center," she said. "Many of our clients have been referred from the center and we refer many of our clients to the center."

Judy Davis, executive director of the Crisis Center, said center representatives refer their guests to Flint Hills Legal Services on a weekly basis.

"We've got its number on speed dial," Davis said.

Former senator to deliver media lecture Wednesday

Paul Simon, former Democratic senator of Illinois and nominee in the 1987-88 presidential election, will speak about community media at 1:30 p.m. Wednesday in Forum Hall in the K-State Student Union.

He is the speaker for the second-annual Huck Boyd Lecture in Community Media.

Simon was a member of Congress for more than 20 years before leaving politics in 1997. Prior to being elected to the U.S. House of Representatives in 1974, he built a chain of 13 community newspapers in Illinois, which he sold to devote his time to politics and writing.

He now is the director of the Public Policy Institute and is a faculty member Southern Illinois University. Simon also teaches classes in political science, history and journalism.

Simon previously was scheduled to speak at K-State on Feb. 9. His speech was canceled when the university was closed due to heavy snow.

Assault on Bangladesh student called hate crime

TOPEKA — A stranger's attack on a man from Bangladesh has been classified by police as a hate crime.

A police report released Sunday said the victim, identified only as a 21-year-old student at Washburn University, was punched in the neck early Saturday morning by one of three men who accosted him at a convenience store.

The victim was treated at a hospital and released, but the president of the Bangladesh Student Association of Topeka, Monjoor Ahmed, said the victim had to be treated again Saturday night.

The victim is a member of the student group, Ahmed said. It includes about 50 natives of Bangladesh who attend Washburn and colleges in surrounding communities.

Group members are concerned, Ahmed said, that Saturday's attack was committed by someone upset by the terrorist attacks of Sept. 11.

NATION IN BRIEF

Law enforcement officials on high alert for attacks

WASHINGTON, D.C. — Attorney General John Ashcroft said Monday that thousands of law enforcement agencies, businesses and utilities have been warned to stay on high alert "while we win this war" on terrorism.

With 614 individuals detained or arrested, Ashcroft said more than 18,000 law enforcement organizations and 27,000 corporate security managers have been notified to be alert following U.S. military strikes in Afghanistan.

Also notified were facilities for telecommunications, electric power, oil and gas, banking, information technology and water supplies.

More than 700 hot air balloons were registered to launch during Sunday's mass ascension at the 30th annual Kodak Albuquerque International Balloon Fiesta.

Donation brings university closer to new grain complex

BY KRISTI KOCH

Kansas State Collegian

K-State is one step closer to having a Grain Science and Industry Complex, thanks to a $528,000 commitment to the KSU Foundation from a friend of K-State.

R.E. "Bud" Morrison of Omaha, Neb., committed to the donation. He is a member of President's Club, a leadership organization for friends and alumni of K-State.

"I'm adopting K-State because of the work they do," Morrison said. "It has been my desire to leave a significant gift because of all the help and knowledge provided in their grain processing programs."

Morrison is a former president and chief operating officer of the grain processing division of ConAgra Foods. After working 42 years in the grain and flour milling business, he retired in 1990.

"Bud Morrison devoted his career to the grain processing industries and, in retirement, has devoted a substantial amount of his resources to guarantee that science and education are directed toward continual innovation and professional development for his industry," said Marc Johnson, dean of the College of Agriculture.

The complex will consist of five buildings: a feed mill, a flour mill, a bioprocessing and industrial value-added center, the International Grains Program Executive Conference Center, and a teaching, research, and administrative building. The project is estimated to cost $60 million, in which half of the support is expected from private sources and the other half from public sources.

"Although Mr. Morrison is not a K-State alumnus, he has recognized the importance of the specialized knowledge which K-State supplies to the milling industry through its unique grain science and industry program," Johnson said.

Gay student finds university accepting, recalls coming out

BY EDIE HALL

Kansas State Collegian

As Cammie McIver, junior in secondary education, walked back to her residence hall between classes, she laughed and talked with her friend, just like any other student at K-State would do.

What makes McIver different from the typical K-State student is advertised by the black T-shirt she wears, which reads "No one knows I'm GAY."

When McIver was in middle school, she had a crush on her best friend.

"They told me that was a normal feeling for a girl my age," McIver said, "but it never went away."

Although McIver thinks she realized she was a lesbian in middle school, she didn't come out until after high school.

McIver is from Winfield, Kan., a small town near Wichita. She said her hometown isn't very open-minded when it comes to sexual orientation.

"I knew in high school, but I still had a boyfriend for three years," McIver said. "It was really hard to be gay in high school. It was hard not to be able to talk about it."

McIver said she came out to her close straight friends at the beginning of school last year.

McIver said her family members were told by her ex-boyfriend that she was gay.

"I know they had a good idea. It really just went unspoken," McIver said. "I never really said, 'Hey, I'm gay.' I did tell my sister at the beginning of the summer, so she knew before everyone else."

McIver said that while her father and sister are supportive, her mother has trouble accepting her.

"She went off the wall at first," McIver said. "Now she can joke about it, but she still has her moments that I can tell she's not OK with it."

After high school, McIver attended Cowley County Community College, where she played basketball and volleyball. Once again, she experienced close-minded peers and adults.

"My basketball coach was homophobic," McIver said. "He kicked a girl off the team, saying it was because of her attitude, but because of comments he had made earlier in the season, the team figured it was because she was openly gay."

McIver said the students at her previous college usually would give her strange looks once they knew she was a lesbian, but wouldn't say anything to her about it.

"I've found that if you are openly gay, people seem to be more accepting of it," McIver said. "When they are suspicious, but don't know for sure, people will say and do mean things, but when they know you are gay for sure, they usually won't say anything; they'll just walk on."

McIver transferred to K-State to be on the rowing team, but an ankle injury will keep her from participating this year. She said students at K-State are pretty accepting of her lifestyle.

"No one's given me any dirty looks yet," McIver said.

McIver said one thing she sees as a problem is the amount of ignorance there is about homosexuality.

"People need to be educated about this type of lifestyle," McIver said. "A lot of people don't know that it's not a choice. No one wants to be gay, it just happens. I think most homophobic people are simply uneducated about the whole situation."

McIver also is a part of the Queer Straight Alliance at K-State.

"I think QSA is a wonderful organization," McIver said. "I joined to help raise community awareness more than anything."

McIver also said she thinks National Coming Out Week is a great idea.

"It's a chance for other people to learn about the gay community, just like the Racial Harmony Week," McIver said. "As far as for the gay community, it simply gives us a chance to say 'We're here, we're queer, we aren't going anywhere.' And it gives the heterosexual community a chance to ask questions.

"Gay people that are 'out' are usually more than willing to talk to you about it. If you want to know something, just ask."

K-State researchers developing mixtures to produce safer, long-lasting meats

BY KERI GEFFERT

Kansas State Collegian

Research conducted at K-State shows that mixing prunes with ground meat leads to a safer, better-tasting product.

Leslie Thompson, graduate student in food science, conducted the research. She said it could be beneficial to institutions such as schools because of its ability to keep more moisture in meat.

"A lot of programs are having to cook the meat at a central location and then take it to another location to reheat it," Thompson said.

Thompson said that by the time the meat is reheated, it has poor quality. By adding a 3 to 6 percent dried-plum mixture, it keeps moisture in the meat, which leads to increased quality and taste.

Not only does the mixture add value and quality, it makes the meat safer.

The research shows the prunes kill common food borne pathogens such as E. coli, Salmonella and Listeria, Thompson said.

She said that freezer burn also is reduced.

Because taste is essential, the product contains 3 to 6 percent of the dried-plum mixture. Thompson said this percentage allows the most benefit without impairing the taste.

"With the level [of dried-plum mixture] we added to the products, there wasn't a distinguishable taste of dried plums," Thompson said.

Similar research, originated at Texas A&M University, tested its antioxidant abilities. They tested the mixture's ability to slow the oxidation of fat. Thompson said oxidation of fat is what causes freezer burn.

To enhance the research Thompson has conducted, she said she plans to continue working with the prunes and might consider adding garlic to the mixture.

This week the Queer Straight Alliance is sponsoring Coming Out Week.

This is a time not only to visibly show your support for gay members of our community but also to vocally support them.

Although many people say they are in support of the gay lifestyle, the language they use tells another story.

Using phrases like "That is so gay" might not seem harmful, but it is. The words you use can be as harmful as actions.

Christina Hauck, adviser for QSA said it is important for gay people to feel safe in Manhattan and to have allies.

You might be an adamant supporter of the cause, but if you use language that is derogatory, it isn't showing support. It is segregation.

Please take a look at the language you use, and please take time to support QSA not only this week, but whenever you can.

Be an ally in every aspect.

Did this last game Saturday against Colorado remind anybody of the 1994 Aloha Bowl against Boston College by chance?

I would just like to know when it became socially acceptable for girls to leave their hats on during the national anthem.

To the guy who was sleeping on the brick wall Friday night on Ratone — didn't you get chilly?

Another day, another power outage. I'll bet the power never goes out in Wefald's mansion.

Two weeks ago the football players were losing helmets. This Saturday they were losing shoes. I am almost scared to go to the next football game.

I thought everyone should know that KU has one victory in the Big 12 and K-State has zero.

This is for all those K-State people that call themselves fans who, by the way, wouldn't get up off their duffs to cheer for their Cats on Saturday: give your tickets up to those true fans who love their Cats, win or lose.

I took my 10-year-old sister out to the football field yesterday to have her kick extra points and she made five in a row, so I'm going to call Coach Snyder and see if he has any jerseys that will fit her.

To my fellow K-Staters who bought a donation T-shirt from Varney's: they lied and pocketed 60 percent.

Hey, Varney's, if I had known you were keeping 6 out of 10 dollars I donated to New York, I would have mailed the money myself. Thanks a lot.

Can I say that it just really sucks that I spent so much money on my GA tickets to sit on a little grassy knoll to the right of the section? Why sell so many tickets if there is no room?

We should send in Gary Condit after the Taliban. He would make them all disappear.

Maybe this Friday instead of Pepsi One, the Union could hand out beer to everyone.

If we're going to call every play at the line, why even waste time huddling?

I can't believe there is not even a paragraph about the winners of Opus Friday night in Monday's paper.

To the girls in Ford who walk around with cigarettes in their hand and sit out front — it is neither sexy nor stylish to smoke. It is gross and unattractive.

This is for all you Greeks who feel they need to show all their love on the sidewalks — can't you think of something better than that? That's pretty lame.

Why do we have to have a gay visibility week? I prefer not to know who's gay.

To all those who say that the basketball team can't read, please go to the Web page and note that they are up there with Harvard and Yale on the GPAs, and their team GPA is probably higher than yours will ever be in your time here at K-State.

Coach Snyder, you have about 10,000 guys on campus and about 5,000 girls who can make an extra point. Get a clue.

To all my fellow GA ticket holders: glad to know I'm not the only student with a half-sunburnt face.

To the person selling their Texas A&M ticket: don't settle for less than $35.

Tuba spelled backwards is a but.

And the worst part is we lost to a team that can't even tie their shoes.

I was just wondering what happened to Joe Rheem, Jamie Rheem's brother, who is supposed to be an All-American kicker.

HALFWAY HOLIDAY

Columbus Day celebration time for reflection

Yesterday, my friendly neighborhood postal worker didn't deliver the mail.

Banks around the nation failed to open their doors.

What caused these things to happen? Was it a huge mistake? Was it a rift in the time-space continuum? Was it just plain laziness?

The answer: none of the above. Yesterday was the second Monday in October, and you know what that means. Yup, Columbus Day. Columbus Day is sort of a half way holiday. It's a federal holiday, so banks are closed. And while rain, sleet, snow, heat and darkness can't keep the mail carrier from his appointed rounds, Columbus Day certainly can.

Meanwhile, I had to finish a paper and work until four in the morning. If Columbus Day really was important, everyone would celebrate it. Instead, it's hit-and-miss. The U.S. Postal Service and all the banks celebrate the holiday, but hardly anyone else does. It's like getting a sugarless birthday cake without frosting — it might look nice, but it's not much good to anyone.

Columbus Day is a celebration of well-meaning failures. It's named after one of the greatest losers in history. Why should we observe this holiday? Let's take a look at its origins and see if we can find the answer.

Christopher Columbus started from Spain in search of a new trade route to India. This was important because Europeans wanted Indian silk, spices and stuff. Unfortunately, the road to India happened to be owned by a bunch of mean people whose primary source of income was the time-honored occupation of stealing things.

That's where Columbus came in.

He, like some educated people of his day, believed the world was round. He also thought it was much smaller than it actually is. He proposed that by sailing west, merchants could get Indian goods without expending so much time and trouble. He was convinced he'd be in India within months of setting out from Spain.

After Columbus' offer had been rejected by nearly every sea-going European country, Queen Isabella of Spain finally agreed to hire him. In the contract, she included the condition that Columbus would have to conquer a few outlying Indian islands for Spain. She probably didn't consider what the Indians would think of this proposal.

What did Columbus request in return for establishing a better trade route to India and conquering some of its outlying islands? He wanted a significant chunk of the profits from the voyage, as well as the title "Admiral of All the Ocean Seas." Yes, Columbus was a man of simple desires.

When he reached the New World, Columbus didn't have a clue as to what he actually discovered. Even after three more voyages, he never quite realized he had found something very big and new.

We know what Columbus didn't about the results of his contact with indigenous people in the New World.

Europeans inadvertently brought disease as well as plants and animals that soon dominated the environment of the Americas. Perhaps more dangerous were the priests who came with the conquistadors. They preached a gospel of love and then put the Indians to work in gold and silver mines. After all, you can't make statues of Baby Jesus out of plain old wood, can you?

I'm not demoralizing the Europeans who subjugated the Americas. If roles were reversed, the Mayans probably would have done the same thing to the Spaniards. One of the great rules of history is that you don't want to be the one who gets discovered. Pre-Columbian Americans found that out the hard way.

We should take time to consider the effects of our actions. That, more than anything else, seems to be the message of Columbus Day.

The discovery and colonization of the Americas was characterized by well-meaning people who didn't think about the consequences their actions had for others.

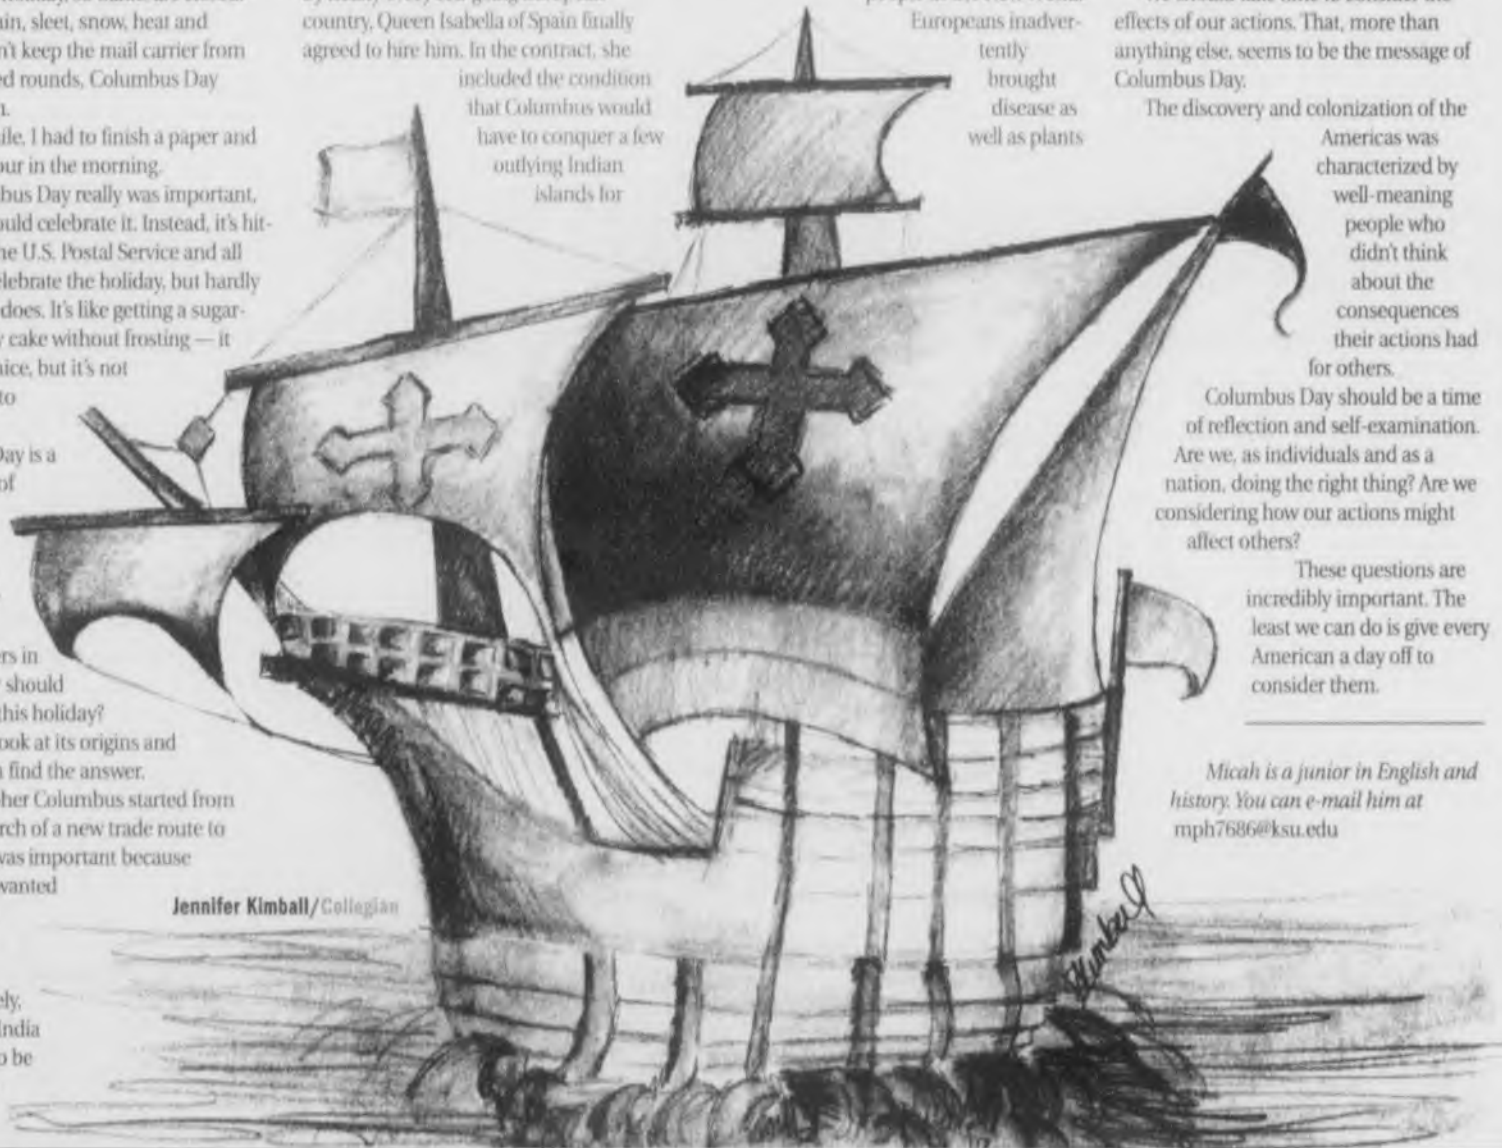

Columbus Day should be a time of reflection and self-examination. Are we, as individuals and as a nation, doing the right thing? Are we considering how our actions might affect others?

These questions are incredibly important. The least we can do is give every American a day off to consider them.

Justice must be goal of new war

The first shoe finally has been dropped in the war against terrorism. Organized military force has been and still is being unleashed upon Afghanistan's military points.

As U.S. and British air attacks destroy key Taliban communications targets and al-Qaeda terrorist camps, we must keep our focus on whom we have engaged, what our goals are and who must be protected in the process.

Americans scream for revenge for the Sept. 11 attacks. An eye for an eye sounds so fair right now. We should not be fighting for revenge. Instead, we should be fighting for justice.

Justice for the victims and their families.

Osama bin Laden still is listed as the top suspect for the attacks. In his taped TV address Sunday, he claimed the U.S. would not feel secure until the "infidel" armies leave his home, the land of Mohammed.

He is trying to embrace the Palestinian struggle to gain religious support. Pakistan tentatively has sided with the U.S., which pits two geographical rivals against one another. Bin Laden might feel his international support slipping.

He was exiled from his home of Saudi Arabia for his extremist views and terrorist activities. Northern Alliance officials have fought for years to rid their country of the Taliban invaders, yet they obviously have been unsuccessful so far. They hope that with coordinated U.S. attacks, they will be able to regain control of their country, according to BBC news (http://news.bbc.co.uk/1/hi/english/world/south_asia/newsid_1570000/1570185.stm).

We're not in this to restore the Afghanistan government, though. We are there to stop terrorist activities and destroy the networks that provide support to terrorists.

We are there to get bin Laden and his minions.

This must be clear to all parties involved. We should not get into another domestic rebuilding effort like Bosnia or Somalia. They were ill-fated U.S. endeavors, and hopefully, we have learned from past mistakes.

As much as we might think we know what's best for the world, maybe we should ask the people we are fighting what they think. If the people don't want U.S. military help, there is no way we can be an effective agent of change.

We must focus on destroying the terrorist infrastructure, not rebuilding the Middle East. Some might argue these two must go hand in hand. If we destroy the systems now, we should rebuild systems that won't fall under the same evil influences.

That might be true, but it should not be on our shoulders alone. The rebuilding effort should be an international one, not an American one.

We all must work to establish a culture that does not encourage, or even permit, terrorism.

Before we get to this point, though, we first must destroy the current system.

Our attacks have been focused on specific targets aimed at disrupting Taliban operations to set up eventual ground troops. This is absolutely critical if we are to make any lasting progress in Afghanistan.

The problem is that there is no country around Afghanistan that is going to let 20,000 American troops march in and set up camp.

According to BBC news, Pakistan is facing serious internal threats for their support of U.S. efforts against Afghanistan because of Muslim religious ties and a mutual hatred for the U.S. (http://news.bbc.co.uk/1/hi/english/world/south_asia/newsid_1552000/1552827.stm).

If we lose their support, further air attacks on the Taliban and any ground movement would be most perilous. We won't have any way to get into Afghanistan. Iran and Iraq have already expressed outrage over U.S. retaliation. Our presence in the Middle East might sour rapidly.

If Pakistan refuses to let us come through, odds are, we might have to force our way through.

That would most definitely be met with massive Islamic resistance, dividing our waning support. Eventually, it could evolve to war between Islam and the West. One mistake and this precarious balance could slip right into World War III.

Student makes buttons to aid victims

BY ALYSON RALETZ
Kansas State Collegian

National organizations have banded together and implemented campaigns to help terrorist attack victims, but Matt Wiltz, senior in business management, has taken it upon himself to aid those affected by the tragedy.

A few days after Sept. 11, Wiltz said he wanted to design and sell a Wildcat pin on campus with all proceeds going to a victim relief fund.

"I like challenges," he said. "I like to try to help out people. I thought it would be good for an individual, not a group, to start giving some help. I wanted to see how far it would go, kind of like the movie 'Pay it Forward.'"

In "Pay it Forward," the lead character is a child who, after helping others, tells them they also must help three other people, an act that becomes a national phenomenon.

Wiltz said he contacted John Fairman, assistant vice president for university relations.

"I didn't pursue it right away because I thought licensing with the trademark would be too complicated," he said. "I didn't want to have to go through the hassle of paying for the use of the Powercat for a cause like this."

Fairman waived all rights until Nov. 24, so Wiltz could sell pins during the football season. He did not have to pay trademark fees because all money is going to charity.

He drew up a design of the K-State Powercat in the bottom right corner of the American flag.

He gave the design to his girlfriend's father, Butch Millard, owner of Mineral Spring Lure Company in Carbondale, Kan., who converted it into a 1 x 2 inch power pin.

Wiltz is selling the pins for $3. Part of the money will go to pay for the pins, but the rest, $1.70, will go to a relief fund.

"So far, a couple of friends and I have been selling them door to door, in classes and to whoever we run into on campus," he said. "They are catching on pretty quickly. I sold one to a Hale librarian, and then she asked for a bag of them so she could sell them to other people at Hale."

He said he plans to set up tables in the K-State Student Union during the next month to sell the pins. He also plans to ask the Union Bookstore to sell them, he said.

"I hope to sell 10,000 pins," he said. "They're good souvenirs and a great way to show support for the victims."

Ida Leupold, a Salvation Army social services representative, said other individuals are helping with relief efforts.

"We have been getting a lot of checks from community members," Leupold said. "People are going to great efforts to make sure their money is going to New York victims and not our general efforts."

Individuals have donated $5-$6,000, she said. Checks still are coming in.

The money is being sent to the Kansas City, Kan., headquarters to contribute to a larger relief fund.

"Some families in New York lost their breadwinners in the attacks," she said. "Manhattan residents just want to make sure their money is helping them to make their house payments and put their kids through school."

Megan Rickel, a disc jockey for KXIB-FM 104.7, also decided to take relief into her own hands.

Rickel coordinated Sunday's Apple Fair at Cico Park, a benefit concert for tragedy attack victims.

She had planned the concert since July, but she immediately decided to donate all proceeds to the United Way after she learned of the attacks, she said.

"The whole focus just changed," she said. "Promoting peace through music is a better way of dealing with things like terrorism than going to a country and bombing people."

Without an official sponsor, she had to ask local businesses for money to fund the concert.

"There was a two-week period I kept hearing, 'No,'" she said. "They all said they had already given to New York, which I was happy about, but I was scared I wasn't going to be able to put on the concert."

She said she eventually raised enough money.

Other people should take initiative to help the victims in New York, she said.

"If I had thought, 'I am only one person, and what can I do about it?' there wouldn't have been a concert," she said. "Take initiative and do something. Do something little by giving blood or contributing to other causes. If you helped better or save someone's life, that's something. It could eventually lead to something huge."

FBI takes over anthrax case following discovery

BY AMANDA RIDDLE
Associated Press Writer

BOCA RATON, Fla. — The FBI on Monday took over the investigation into the anthrax death of a Florida man after the germ was found in the nose of a co-worker and on a computer keyboard in their office. Hundreds of people who worked near the men lined up to get medical tests.

Attorney General John Ashcroft said the case could become a clear criminal investigation.

"We don't have enough information to know whether this could be related to terrorism or not," he said during a news conference in Washington.

The FBI sealed off the Boca Raton building housing several supermarket tabloids, including The Sun, where both men worked. Agents donned protective gear before going inside.

How the bacterial spores got into the newspaper's office remained under investigation. Federal investigators handling the cases have eliminated the obvious environmental sources of anthrax, said Barbara Reynolds, a spokeswoman for the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention in Atlanta. Sen. Bob Graham, D-Fla., said CDC officials told him that human intervention was the likely cause of contamination.

Health officials insisted there was no public health threat, but there was unease among some of the 500 people waiting for antibiotics and anthrax tests at the Palm Beach County health agency Monday.

Anthrax cannot be spread from person to person, but all 300 people who work in the building — and anyone who spent more than an hour inside since Aug. 1 — were advised to visit health officials.

Antibiotics can treat anthrax, though the form that killed Sun photography editor Bob Stevens is particularly lethal. Stevens, 63, died Friday of inhalation anthrax, the first such fatality in the United States since 1976.

The anthrax exposure case reported Monday involved a Sun mailroom employee identified by co-workers as 73-year-old Ernesto Blanco. Health officials said he had anthrax bacteria in his nasal passages, but he has not been diagnosed with the disease.

Lackluster special team's performance hurts effectiveness of Cats game plan

BY DAN SMITH
Kansas State Collegian

Head football coach Bill Snyder was expecting a lot out of his kicking game Saturday afternoon at KSU Stadium. What he got instead, however, was two missed field goals, a bobbled punt snap and an extra point that hit one upright and fell harmlessly to the Wagner Field turf.

In all, the possibility of seven points and maybe more with good field position, were squandered as a direct result of the Cats' special teams' problems Saturday.

But for as much as K-State's punting and kicking performances have worried Snyder so far, it's the other units of the Wildcats that have suffered the most from K-State's lackluster special teams' performances this season.

"They're struggling," senior wideout Aaron Lockett said after K-State's 16-6 loss to Colorado. "It's frustrating, and they're just not getting the job done. I think our special teams really stunk in a lot of ways."

It's hard to imagine the kicking game hurting K-State much more than it already has this season, but in a loss that seemed to showcase everything wrong with Snyder's young football team this season, one thing was made crystal clear, Lockett said. It must be fixed, and soon, if the Wildcats are to overcome two early losses and do much of anything this year.

"We're working on it and we'll continue to work on it," Lockett said, "but if we don't get it corrected, I think it's going to continue to hurt us."

K-State's kicking woes were magnified even more because of the Cats' recent successes in special teams play.

Playing in the shadows of former Wildcat stars, K-State's 2-of-4 field goal and 9-of-14 extra point statistics are a far cry from the tradition began by Martin Gramatica in 1994 and carried on by Jamie Rheem until last season.

But at least part of the problem, specialist Travis Brown said, might be the absence of strong-legged kicker Jared Brite from the Wildcat lineup.

"I will definitely tell you I'm the last person that I think should be in there doing that," he said. "I think Brite has got a monster of a leg, and I would want him in there over me."

Brown mishandled a punt snap against Colorado in K-State's first drive of the second half, giving the Buffs the ball at the Wildcats' 22-yard line. Colorado extended the lead to 10-0 on that drive behind a Jeremy Flores 31-yard field goal. It was just one of many costly mistakes on the day, Brown said.

"It's frustrating," he said. "It's very frustrating and you can't do anything but keep on plugging at it and try to get through it."

Brite, who would normally handle both punting and kicking duties for K-State, has seen limited action since suffering an undisclosed injury after the Cats' game against USC earlier this year, forcing junior reserve Kyle Altwater and Brown to fill his void.

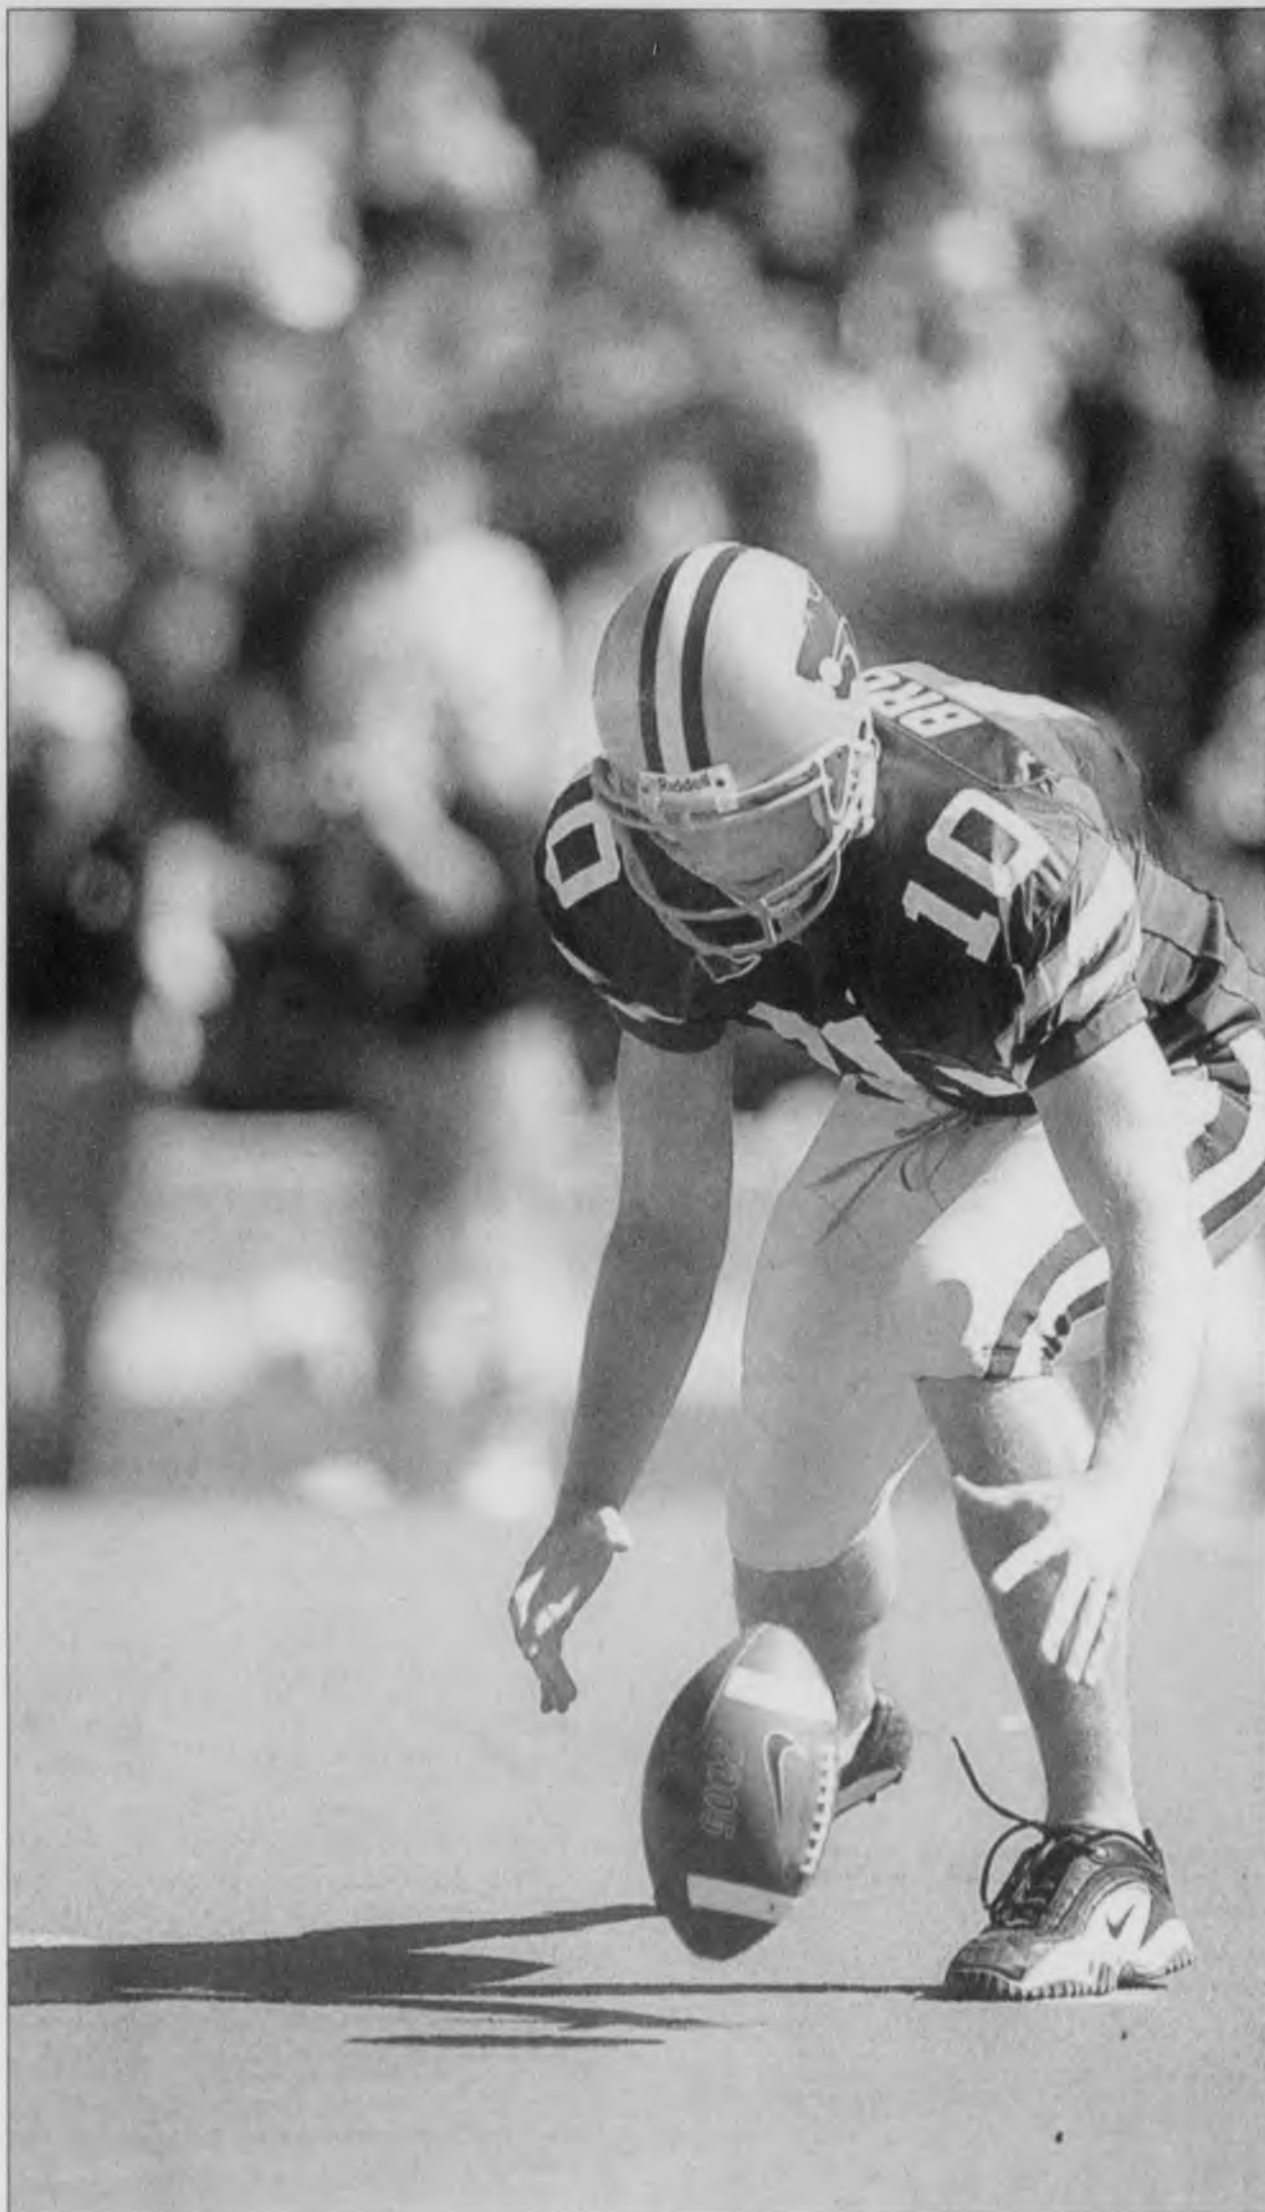

But Altwater, who missed field goals of 53 and 27 yards against CU, and Brown, who was pressured on nearly every punt attempt last weekend, have floundered instead of flourished lately.

So what is Snyder's plan for the rest of the season?

"You can't just say, 'OK they can't do it,' and go home," Snyder said. "We're not going to go for two points every time we get the ball in the end zone. You just have to come out. You've got to keep practicing. You've got to be like the guy who got a holding penalty or whatever is, you get. You just got to say 'Hey, I'm going to get better.'"

And at this point in the season, Snyder said, it's crucial that improvement begins with the kicking game.

"It just goes back to being fundamentally sound every single time," he said. "We've got to get better."

Evan Semón/Collegian

Punter Travis Brown bobbles a center snap during Saturday's game against Colorado. Brown was tackled for a loss that led to a Colorado 31-yard field goal. Place-kicker Kyle Altwater missed two field goal attempts, including a 27-yarder, and place-kicker Jared Brite missed an extra point.

Resilient back overpowers Cats

BY DEREK BOSS
Kansas State Collegian

K-State defense isn't exactly accustomed to seeing a running back like Colorado's Chris Brown.

Not speaking in terms of talent — the Wildcats face quality Nebraska I-backs every year. Nor in terms of size, either, as Brown's 6-foot-3.225-pound stature is scrawny compared to Texas A&M's 300-pound Ja'Mar Toombs last season.

The distinction lies elsewhere — in Brown's ability and strength to carry the ball a whopping 33 times against K-State on Saturday.

In fact, the Cats haven't seen an opponent register more than 30 rushing attempts in a game since Iowa State's Troy Davis in November of 1996. And he had 48.

Brown pounded the ball off tackle all afternoon against K-State, racking up 114 yards and becoming the first back this season to top the century mark on the Cat defensive unit.

The sophomore's 3.5 yards per carry might not have been astounding, though, nor was his number of big runs on the day, with only two rushes over 10 yards.

It was his resiliency taking the ball north and south, breaking tackles, and picking himself up to do it all over again, CU coach Gary Barnett said after the game — all against a K-State team that ranked fourth in the nation in rush defense (51.3 ypg).

"That's why you have him — for fourth quarters and games like this," Barnett said of Brown. "We advertised all week to everybody that this was just going to be a good, old-fashioned, 1970s football game. I was surprised it took more than two hours to play it."

"But to do that, you've got to have some backs that'll get down and dirty when it's time to do it, and Chris is one of those guys that did that."

Brown didn't mind the workload, though, he said. After all, he was used to getting 30 or more carries during his freshman season at Fort Scott Community College, and he was confident in his ability to run the ball — even against K-State's front seven.

"There's no question that we could come in and be physical," Brown said. "For the last few weeks, we've been overpowering teams, and I credit that to the offensive line coming to play and Daniel Graham the tight end, up front in the trenches going to war."

Yet, the recent overpowering of teams on the ground hadn't been thanks to a one-man committee. Prior to the K-State contest, it was

Recent terrorist acts have interesting effects on world of sports

In the aftermath of last month's terrorist attacks in New York, we are left with many questions.

We ask, "Why did it happen?" "Could it have been avoided?" and "What next?"

Now, I don't want to be the only insensitive guy to poke fun at serious issues, but what do these events mean to sports?

Joe Elkinton

my view

Will our nation's college athletes and sports fans leave to fight in the impending war?

Like the gouging of gas prices, will Gatorade prices be driven up, or maybe even Powerbars?

God forbid the unthinkable occurs and the National Foosball Tournament is canceled.

But what I want to know is, will Afghanistan be participating in the 2002 Olympics in Salt Lake City, Utah?

Now, I know Afghanistan has been banned from the International Olympics Committee since 1998, the first time since 1936. Despite their petitions in the past to be allowed back in the IOC, will they even try in the future to get in, considering their country is on the brink of war?

With some Afghan citizens harboring such abject hate for America, will they even want to cross the sea, bear their torch and wave their flag for opening ceremonies?

Oh, that's right, they only send athletes such as wrestlers and boxers to the Summer Olympics, no winter sports for the Afghans.

Prior to the Summer Olympics last year in Sydney, the Taliban feebly pleaded the IOC to send their Olympic team to participate, but refused to require their athletes to shave off their obligatory beards and let women compete.

I'll tell you what, this sounds like the next Club Med hot spot.

So, besides the Taliban hating America because of our capitalism and support of Israel, they must resent us for our sexual liberation of women and our advanced facial shaving technology. That damned Mach 3 razor is always causing a ruckus.

Ravaged by 20 years of war, they barely can dream of taking part in the most hallowed world event known to man, besides Oktoberfest.

However, again I ask, will they even want to? Will they boycott?

It might be likely, considering America, along with over 60 other nations, boycotted the 1980 Summer Olympics in Moscow, due to the Soviet invasion of Afghanistan.

Wait a second there, Tex, America reacted in favor of Afghanistan? What a difference 21

Brothers From Different Mothers

Brothers From Different Mothers, (BFDM), a punk ska band originally from Topeka, won the Opus Band Competition on Friday.

The band consists of six members. Saxophone player and lead vocalist Aaron Graverson, sophomore in music education; drummer Evan Weir, freshman in environmental development; guitarist Colin MacMillan; bassist Rusty Wiley; trumpet player Eric Padilla; and trombone player Haley Holloman.

Graverson said the $400 prize the band won from Opus will go toward completing its upcoming album. The album is about half completed, he said, and is being recorded in Lawrence.

Graverson said he writes most of the material, working on his saxophone to come up with something he likes. While writing is a way to express things for himself, Graverson said the performance aspect is what motivates him.

"I want people to get the energy and enthusiasm of our shows," he said. "When people come and see us play, I hope they want to see us again because even with an album in the works, the point is to do live shows."

Change of Mind

Photos by Evan Semón/Collegian

In the musical "A New Brain," Gordon Schwinn, played by Chance Mullen (center), senior in theater, a songwriter who writes songs for a children's show, has a stroke that calls for high-risk brain surgery. The play features a variety of characters such as a Homeless Lady, played by Sarah McElroy, senior in music, who constantly is begging for "change," and a Minister, played by Travis Murray, senior in music appreciation, who constantly provides advice.

Play's theme helps characters re-examine life

BY JJ DUNCAN

Kansas State Collegian

With a singing frog, a cynical song writer and a damaged mind, "A New Brain" focuses on what really matters in life.

After a rigorous rehearsal schedule, director Kate Anderson said she still has fun with the musical.

"I still don't mind watching the show every night," she said. "It reminds us to appreciate all the gifts we have while we have them instead of moaning about the things we don't have."

"A New Brain" opens 8 p.m. Wednesday, and the play tells the story of songwriter Gordon Schwinn. Gordon (played by Chance Mullen, senior in theater) is working on songs for a children's show he has come to despise before he has a stroke that necessitates high risk brain surgery.

As Gordon prepares for the life-threatening surgery, he evaluates his life and tries to put it all into perspective. Mullen said the character is less stereotypical than most musical protagonists.

"Usually, the hero is someone you love because they're perfect," he said. "My character is doubtful and insecure. He's no hero. He bitches and whines."

"He treats the people close to him, that care about him, poorly, and he becomes self-centered. But you still want to root for him because he's a real person."

Some of the play takes place within the reality of Gordon's hospital room and his apartment, while the rest takes place within the surreal environment of Gordon's brain. With his brain affected by stress from life, sickness and medication, the scenes take on a separate tone.

Anderson said the challenge presented to the cast and crew by such an idea motivated them all to make it work as smoothly as possible.

"It's so theatrical in a way that it allows for creative ingenuity for design in costume and set," she said. "Lots of the time, we're seeing what's going on in Gordon's mind, so we're trying to blend the natural elements with the surreal, theatrical elements."

The musical lasts one hour, 40 minutes and has no intermission. Since there is hardly any spoken dialogue, it challenges the cast's singing voices, Mullen said.

"Singing all the way through it is tough," he said. "There's lots of emotions I've never shown on stage before."

Mullen is onstage for almost the entire show, and he said he was scared briefly when he got sick and lost his voice.

"Last week, I got really sick, and I was not doing well," he said. "So the last two weekends I haven't gone out partying. I just stay home and drink lots of water."

The constant music of the production also is an endurance test for the two musicians, Bill Wingfield, music director, said.

"When I first played it all the way through, I was exhausted," he said. "It's really like running in a small race. You build up your endurance."

Wingfield plays piano and Charles Faulk plays synthesizer. The two provide all the music for the play. The technically challenging piece is interesting because it mixes different kinds of music into one production, and the different moods are expressed through the music, Wingfield said.

"The different styles describe the different emotional states he's going through," he said. "It's interesting because of the distinctive styles used for each mood. It's a balance of variety with repetition that any musical is always trying to achieve."

The set is designed to accommodate the telling of the story without a curtain to help change things around, Mike Reese, scenic designer, said.

"It's not the usual kind of play," he said. "There's no curtain or scene changes. You go from start to stop right in front of people, so I had to accommodate for that."

Lending to the surreal aspects of the scenes in Gordon's mind, Reese said projections were created to show what actually is happening to Gordon in certain scenes. While Gordon is unconscious, a picture of him in his hospital bed is projected as a scene unfolds before the audience that is in his head, Reese said.

"The projections help the audience figure out what's happening in real life because he's unconscious or hallucinating sometimes," he said.

One recurring hallucination is Mr. Bungee, the children's show host that Gordon writes music for before he becomes bound to the hospital. Michael Parker, senior in pre-professional secondary education, said playing Mr. Bungee is a physical challenge.

ABOVE: Michael Parker, senior in pre-professional secondary education, plays Mr. Bungee, a frog that haunts Gordon Schwinn (played by Chance Mullen, senior in theater). The frog, coupled with the pressures of his life, drives Schwinn to have a stroke. LEFT: Roger, played by Keenan Ramos, freshman in theater, is Gordon Schwinn's homosexual lover who attempts to comfort and understand Schwinn as he is dealing with all his anxieties.

The costume requires Parker to wear a large frog head as well as rollerskate shoes.

"The head is difficult to wear because if you tip your head too far one way, it just keeps going," he said. "I've had the skates for about a month. It took a few days to learn to use them and even longer to turn on them because the wheels are just in the heels of the shoes."

The musical is entertaining above all, and Mullen said he hopes that lots of people get to see it.

"It's funny, entertaining and it doesn't take forever," he said. "And the character is someone people can identify with. It also has a good message in values."

Watching Gordon work through things has a positive effect, Anderson said. She said she hopes "A New Brain" leaves audiences feeling good about life.

"I want it to make them think about how if they're healthy and alive, how lucky they are," she said. "And that family and loved ones and art are all very important parts of everyone's lives."

ATTACKS

Bush, whose planned meeting Tuesday with the Joint Chiefs of Staff was postponed, has not disclosed his plans to follow up the air strikes. However, U.S. officials said he wants to shake bin Laden and fellow terrorists from Afghan hideouts and into the hands of American or other anti-Taliban ground forces.

British Prime Minister Tony Blair, Bush's staunchest ally, hinted that the offensive would expand.

"In time, (the air strikes) will be supported by other actions, again carefully targeted," Blair said. He didn't elaborate, but the British defense ministry said ground operations were an option.

Anti-aircraft fire lit the skies over the Afghan capital of Kabul, where electricity was cut and Taliban radio told residents to close the blinds on their windows and remain indoors. A Taliban-friendly news agency said an airport and TV transmission tower were targeted and a bomb landed near a 400-bed women's hospital — reports that were not confirmed by the Pentagon.

Bush, speaking shortly before the second day's assaults began, said the opening volley was executed as planned. Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld had a more modest assessment.

"We cannot yet state with certainty that we destroyed the dozens of military command and control and leadership targets we selected," Rumsfeld said.

The military campaign is aimed at punishing the Taliban for harboring bin Laden, the man accused of plotting the Sept. 11 attacks on New York and Washington that left more than 5,500 people dead or missing.

U.S. officials lifted any doubt that they wanted the Taliban overthrown.

"The only way that the Afghan people are going to be successful in heaving the terrorist network out of their country is to be successful against ... that portion of the Taliban and the Taliban leadership that are so closely linked to the Al-Qaeda," Rumsfeld said.

He said the United States was working with the northern alliance and tribes in the south who oppose the Taliban.

Sen. Carl Levin, D-Mich., chairman of the Senate Armed Services Committee, said after a Pentagon briefing that the U.S. military is engaged in a war of attrition "in which the Afghan opposition can gain enough strength and we can weaken the Taliban enough so a broad-based group can take on the Taliban."

As lawmakers were briefed, U.S. strikes were sending thousands of Afghan refugees in flight from Kabul, their possessions strapped to donkeys. The line of hungry, scared Afghans crossed paths with northern alliance fighters.

The soldiers were moving Soviet-made Scud missiles south toward the capital, apparently preparing for an offensive on Kabul under the protection of U.S. air strikes.

Other aerial strikes were under way on the Taliban stronghold of Kandahar, according to a Taliban official who refused to be identified by name.

At the same time, the Afghan Islamic Press agency said the northern alliance launched a major attack Monday evening on the Taliban position near Dara-e-Suf, not far away.

The display of U.S. military might sparked anti-American rioting in one Pakistan city near the Afghanistan border. Mobs lobbed firebombs into a haze of tear gas while praising bin Laden.

There were protests, too, in Europe and outside the White House, where about 50 demonstrators carried signs that read, "Stop the bombing." Some feared retaliation from terrorists.

Ashcroft spoke in grim tones about a long list of steps taken by the government to guard against further strikes, including increased security at nuclear facilities and power plants.

Vice President Dick Cheney was taken to a secret location outside the White House to protect the continuity of government while Bush toils at the presidential mansion — a potential terrorist target.

And the government imposed new security rules limiting passengers to one carry-on bag and one pocketbook or briefcase.

The warnings didn't stop New York City from conducting a flag-waving Columbus Day parade. "We're going ahead with our lives," mayor Rudolph Giuliani said.

LEGAL SERVICES

"Lots of our clients need legal representation and Flint Hills Legal Services is first class legal representation. Its staff is particularly sensitive to domestic violence issues."

She said it is the center's job to stay abreast of community resources for domestic violence, such as medical care and housing.

"The strong relationship between the Crisis Center and Flint Hills Legal services has been a long-standing tradition," she said. "It is a very valuable resource."

Melanie Odell, a coordinator assistant for the Manhattan Housing Authority, has been a client of the law firm since August 2000.

After the Crisis Center helped her set up a Protective Abuse Order against the father of her three children, she was referred to Thompson at Flint Hills Legal Services to help her with her upcoming child custody battle.

"I knew I needed legal help," Odell said. "I was pregnant and knew I could afford nothing with no income. I was amazed at how quickly they accepted me and at how quickly someone was able to show up and represent me."

She said she was impressed with the quality of service. In the past, her parents helped her hire other lawyers who charged high legal fees without taking the time to inform her of the technicalities of her case or return her phone calls.

"Without Gabrielle, I would've had a big fight," she said. "He had hired the best lawyers. It would've been hard without representation."

She said the court needed a psychological evaluation of her whole family, which would have been confusing for her to do without a lawyer.

"If you're in a situation like that, you are already scared," she said. "The court can be confusing. Especially when you are dealing with the custody of your children, the court can give you your life or take it from you."

"Knowing lawyers will be there to represent you helps out a lot," Odell said she won residential custody, with the father retaining some visitation rights. The father still is appealing, but the case has been put on hold until he finishes his prison term.

Shanna Ubel, managing secretary for Flint Hills Legal Services, said she encounters every client or person seeking assistance from the center as they walk in the door.

"It has the stigma we are a government agency, which we are not," Ubel said. "People think they are entitled to our services, but we are a non-profit agency which allows us to accept or not accept cases at our discretion."

She said being the office's front runner is difficult because if people are denied service, she is the one who hears their reactions.

"A lot of people need our help," she said. "It is so hard to hear, 'I don't have the money to afford an attorney,' or, 'I'm going to lose my children if you don't help me.'"

She said many of the rejected clients become emotional and distressed. These are aspects of the job the lawyers do not always see because they are not the ones dealing with it, she said.

"There are so many people that we can't help them all," she said. "It is so hard to say no."

old dairy barn, but a capacity to hold 40 to 50 more cows, said George Ward, professor of dairy and poultry science in a 1974 interview. The new dairy unit actually was built in 1976 and opened in 1977.

John Shirley, associate professor of dairy cattle nutrition and management, said about 65 head of cattle were moved from the old dairy. Producers throughout the state donated heifers to increase the herd size. There are 200 cows plus additional heifers.

The multifaceted facilities are used for teaching and research.

Shirley said the animal science gestation class uses the cows to do pregnancy checking. The dairy herd management class is involved with the operations of the dairy, and the Introduction to Dairy Science class goes out several times during the semester as well.

Area elementary schools come for tours. The facilities receive between 2,000 and 5,000 visitors each year, Shirley said.

About 15 students are employed and work various hours, he said.

Lynn Schwarz, sophomore in animal science, has worked at the dairy unit for three semesters. She said the students do a lot of feeding and substitute milking.

"They get there at 4:30 in the morning to mix the different diets and feed," she said.

A feed mill is located on the property and is used to formulate both the regular and research diets for the cows, Shirley said.

Students also do daily observations on the cattle. When the maternity cows are ready to calve, they help pull them, Schwarz said.

Cows go into a maternity barn about three weeks before calving. They are put on a specific diet and are put in individual pens when ready to calve, Shirley said.

Graduate students and students from the vet school use the unit for research pretty intensively, Shirley said.

A tie-stall barn was built in 1992 and is used to conduct most of the research. The 48-foot by 162-foot building is partially climate-controlled with heating and air conditioning and is used for individual housing of the cows. Two times each day, the cows are taken out for exercise, Shirley said.

Along with the milking parlor, there are lots where the cows are housed. The lots are covered and have free stalls. Shades and a sprinkler system are used in the summer to keep the cows cool, Shirley said.

Individual calf hutches also are there. Shirley said this is the best way to raise calves because it gives them shelter and freedom to move around.

"The method has an extremely low death rate," he said.

Older calves are moved into super hutches that hold 8 to 10 calves per pen.

With the barn burning down last week, adjustments have been made. A smaller amount of feed has been stored in the commodity shed that has been cleaned out for that purpose.

"It's ok for right now," Schwarz said.

AMERICA RESPONDS

Taliban ready for war, known for strict rule

BY NANCY HULL
Kansas State Collegian

A football field in Afghanistan serves as an execution ground for several years.

Men are hung from goal posts. Women kneel down in the penalty area and are shot.

AMERICAN TRAGEDY

This is the fifth in a series of stories aimed to educate the K-State community about Middle Eastern affairs. Look for it every Wednesday and Friday.

events at the stadium — a place of leisure — as celebrations.

"When justice is done on behalf of a victim, that too brings a joyful event, which brings order and security to society," Taliban foreign minister Wakil Motawakil said to a British reporter.

While the radical regime has controlled Afghans since it captured the capital city of Kabul in 1996, it has become known worldwide for refusing to turn over Osama bin Laden, the prime suspect in the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks on the United States.

Now, U.S.-led airstrikes in Afghanistan aim at crippling the militia's small but worrisome defenses and training camps, punishing the Taliban for supporting terrorism and undercutting its ability to fight rebel powers.

Yet the estimated 40,000 fighters are ready. They declared a jihad, or holy war, and rallied supporters to resist.

"The attack by America is a terrorist act," said Mullah Abdul Salam Zaeef, Taliban ambassador to Pakistan. "We will fight to the last breath."

International students see harm in visa policy

BY SARAH BAHARI
Kansas State Collegian

K-State's international community says while it supports more in-depth background checks for student visas, a blanket policy restricting international students only would hurt universities.

"Foreign students help economically. They pay tuition. They buy cars. They rent houses. They spend money," said Donna Davis, director of the International Student Center. "Above that, though, is the cultural exchange. They teach us. We learn about their culture."

But after it was discovered that some of the hijackers of the planes that crashed into the World Trade Center and Pentagon might have been in the United States on student visas, some people have called for tighter restrictions to ensure the nation's safety.

Sen. Diane Feinstein, D-Calif., had planned to introduce legislation that would impose a six-month moratorium on the issuance of student visas. She recently decided to kill that part of her proposal after receiving a letter from the American Council on Education on behalf of 29 other organizations.

Because fewer than 2 percent of all visas are student visas, many international educators say targeting just this group would fail to accomplish anything. Foreigners still can enter the country on work, travel or tourist visas.

"It would hurt students like you can't imagine," Davis said. "That would only add to the negative economic impact that this tragedy has already caused."

At K-State, the approximately 1,100 international students pay out-of-state tuition, which is $308.65 per credit hour, compared to in-state tuition, which is only $77.75. The students come from more than 100 countries, Davis said, with China and India representing the largest international student populations.

Manmohan Uttarwar, graduate student in computer science, said international students contribute to the research at K-State.

"Many international students are brilliant," said Uttarwar, who is from India. "It's very much advantageous. It's a mutual benefit."

Uttarwar said the United States' graduate

WASHINGTON, D.C. — The United States hit Afghanistan with a third day of airstrikes, crushing Taliban air defenses, radars and airports to the extent that American warplanes can fly virtually unchallenged night and day, the Pentagon said Tuesday.

"The skies are now free," President Bush said.

The administration pushed for the surrender of Osama bin Laden's terrorist network and the ouster of the Taliban regime that shelters him. Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld urged Afghan dissidents to "heave the al-Qaeda and the Taliban leadership ... out of the country."

Bin Laden's spokesman called for a holy war against U.S. interests and Executive Chef Jason McGraw prepares a salad with a variety of dressings that includes parmesan peppercorn, sun-dried tomato vinaigrette and peanut dressing. McGraw teaches a cooking class, Chef's Kitchen, in the Bluemont Room of the K-State Student Union several times during the school year.

Kelsey Needham, senior in psychology and pre-medicine, taste tests a few of the chef's concoctions. The cooking class was Tuesday in Bluemont Hall, and participants were given the opportunity to sample dishes.

Dressings and marinades abounded Tuesday night when two students and an alumnus joined Executive Chef Jason McGraw for a cooking class, Chef's Kitchen, in the Bluemont Room of the K-State Student Union.

Annie Huber, junior in pre-occupational therapy, said "yum" after almost every bite she took of marinated teriyaki chicken.

For the first part of the free monthly class, the students watched McGraw mix different ingredients to make seven dressings and marinades while asking questions.

For the second part, they got to eat. Huber said she enjoyed all the marinated chicken and beef and the parmesan peppercorn dressing, sun-dried tomato vinaigrette and peanut dressing on lettuce.

"Are you telling me that I can make this?" she said. "This is better than my mom's."

McGraw said Huber, as well as anyone else, could make the products of his recipes. He said that was the purpose of the class — to make things that were simple and fast enough for working people and students.

"Yeah, I can show you how to use French techniques and use expensive equipment that you'll never buy, but it's not going to do you any good," he said. "My whole idea of this class is to keep it simple. If I can, I do."

Huber's friend, Kelsey Needham, senior in psychology and pre-medicine, said she goes to every campus event, but the cooking class would be especially beneficial for her.

"I'm a cooking moron," she said.

Both women, as well as alumnus Tim Lindemuth, who works for the KSU Alumni Association, said their favorite dressing they tried was the sun-dried tomato vinaigrette. Huber said she is thinking about using it for her Thanksgiving dinner.

Lindemuth said he was so grateful to hear about and attend the cooking class. He said he lives alone and needed more ideas for when he has guests over for dinner.

"I'm sick and tired of cheese and crackers," he said. "I've been looking for something like this for a

The future of K-State on its way to becoming a top 10 land-grant university, and it's all because everyone asks the same question.

"Is it good for K-State?" President Jon Wefald said.

When Wefald arrived at K-State in 1986, enrollment was declining, the KSU Alumni Association was satisfied if it raised $7 to $10 million compared to the more than $40 million it raises annually now, and the football program was so poor, it was probable that K-State would be asked to leave the Big Eight Conference.

"One of the things we've accomplished here since '86 with vice presidents, deans and department heads, the question that everybody asks now, which they did not in 1986:

"Is it good for K-State?" Wefald said.

This question is vital, Wefald said, as from the period from 1945 to 1986, the question was, "Is it good for our department?" or "Is it good for this college?"

"They did not ask 'is it good for K-State?' As a result, the library got no funding and was on the back burner. No one was looking out for the whole university," he said.

THEORY OF EMPOWERMENT

Wefald credits a theory of empowerment to the faculty in spurring this work toward a common goal. He and Provost Jim

Local Chili's restaurant to donate profits to victims

Chili's Bar and Grill is participating in a nationwide restaurant effort, Dine for America, to help New York victims.

Thursday more than 1,500 Chili's restaurants will donate 100 percent of the day's profits to the American Red Cross Disaster Relief Program.

Red Cross representatives will be at the Manhattan site to answer questions and explain how the money for the fund will be used.

Kirk Keling, Manhattan Chili's general manager, said some servers have offered their Thursday tips to the fund, while other cooks are donating their salaries for the day.

"It's part of our corporate philosophy, growing the perfect pepper," Keling said. "Being involved in the community is important to us. All of this money is going to the people who need it most."

There also will be raffles and other promotions for customers on Thursday that would help benefit the fund.

He said Chili's is not the only restaurant participating. Restaurants across the country, like On the Border, Red Lobster and Macaroni Grill also are participating in Dine for America.

As a nationwide restaurant chain, he said Chili's hopes to contribute $2 million to the relief fund.

He said some customers already have started to giving money to servers as they learn of the program.

"I look forward to a lot of people coming out on Thursday to support the cause," he said. "So far, there has been a positive response from customers."

STATE IN BRIEF

Douglas County attorneys investigating KU fraud case

LAWRENCE — Campus police at the University of Kansas have wrapped up a probe into allegations of theft from an athletic booster fund and sent their findings to Douglas County prosecutors.

Police said Monday that more than $8,000 might have been reimbursed incorrectly from the KU Athletic Corp. The findings were turned over to the district attorney's office Friday.

The athletic corporation asked police to investigate in August after a university audit showed possible overcharges for entertainment expenses claimed on payment vouchers for two years, beginning in August 1999.

Police have declined to say who was under investigation, but Scott McMichael, who was director of the Williams Educational Fund, resigned in August in the midst of the probe.

McMichael's lawyer, Bill Skepek, acknowledged Monday that police had been reviewing McMichael's expense reports but characterized any financial discrepancies as "a record-keeping situation."

Former governor appointed to parks department office

TOPEKA — Former Gov. Mike Hayden is returning to public service in Kansas as the secretary-designee for the Department of Wildlife and Parks.

The announcement was made Tuesday by Gov. Bill Graves during a news conference.

Hayden served as governor from 1987 to 1991. His appointment as secretary is contingent upon the confirmation of current secretary Steve Williams to a federal post with the U.S. Fish and Wildlife Service.

Graves said the announcement was an opportunity to say good-bye and thanks to Williams and "Welcome home" to Hayden.

"I'm honored that someone from our administration's been asked to perform on behalf of our country," Graves said.

He said Hayden would work out of the governor's office until Williams leaves for Washington. Hayden will draw the same $92,222 salary as Williams until January 2003, when the eight-year Graves administration ends.

Florida authorities suspect foul play in anthrax cases

BOCA RATON, Fla. — Federal officials suspect foul play rather than an environmental source is at the root of two Florida anthrax cases that have left one man dead and hundreds of co-workers getting tested for the disease.

The FBI sealed off the offices of American Media Inc., where both men worked.

During the night, a stream of unmarked cars entered the adjoining parking lot, where agents peeled off layers of blue and purple gloves and washed their hands with water from a fire truck.

The Palm Beach County Health Department tested 743 people connected to the building on Monday and expected 100 others Tuesday, said Alina Alonso, the department's director of clinical services.

How the bacterium got into the newspaper's office remained unknown.

FAA limiting passengers to one carry-on bag each

WASHINGTON, D.C. — Continuing to tighten airline security following last month's terrorist attacks, the Federal Aviation Administration is limiting passengers to one carry-on bag and a pocketbook or briefcase. All other luggage must be checked.

The FAA restrictions on carry-on baggage mirror the rules imposed on flights to and from Reagan National Airport when it reopened last week.

The federal agency also is telling passengers that they must be prepared to show a photo ID along with their boarding pass at the gate before they board the plane, another step first taken at National Airport.

Student wins International Grand Tour Scholarship

Lohmann

Matt Lohmann

senior in landscape architecture

Matt Lohmann, senior in landscape architecture, is one of four recipients and the only American ever to win the International Grand Tour Scholarship this July.

"I was kind of speechless," he said of the honor. Lohmann said it was a surprise to him because of the competition he expected from across the globe.

"It's definitely an honor," he said. "Basically, I was kind of honored and shocked all in one. I'm assuming that in the future there will be several more from the United States who win this scholarship."

As a result of winning this scholarship, Lohmann was given the opportunity to tour 22 of the nation's best designed and maintained golf courses over a three-week period.

"This wonderful experience gave me the opportunity to sketch, study, photograph, and in a few cases, play these fine tests of golf," Lohmann said.

To apply for the scholarship, Lohmann completed what he said was an extensive application process.

The other scholarship winners were from Canada, Australia, Germany and the United Kingdom.

Gay couple discusses role in changing adoption policies

BY EDIE HALL

Kansas State Collegian

As his voice grew softer and tears came to his eyes, Jon Holden, husband of Michael Galluccio, recalled how he felt when he was told that he would not be able to adopt a child, Adam, jointly with his companion because they were not legally married.

"It was the worst thing anyone has ever said to me in my life," Holden said.

Galluccio and Holden lectured on adoption rights for gay couples in the K-State Student Union Main Ballroom as a part of National Coming Out Week to receptive audience members.

"I personally feel like a better person after hearing these men speak," Ashley Harding, sophomore in psychology, said. "It really opened my eyes to a different viewpoint. I thought it was awesome."

The couple gained national attention by filing a class-action lawsuit against the state of New Jersey in which they demanded a change in the policy barring their joint adoption efforts.

The couple ran up against many objections, but had even more support.

"People would say, 'You're robbing him of a mother,' 'You'll raise him as a homosexual,' 'You might molest him,' and other similar things," Holden said. "However, despite these people's opinion, we had even more people saying, 'Good for you. You will make good parents.'"

As a result of the lawsuit, New Jersey became the first state in which sexual orientation or marital status does not matter in adoptions. Now, Holden and Galluccio travel and speak to groups around the country about their story and exploring the full extent of the American Dream despite sexual orientation. They also are parents to three children. Adam, 6, was the first child they adopted. The couple also adopted a little girl named Madison, who now is 4, and her older sister Rosa, who now is 19. The couple are grandparents to Rosa's first child, Marianna, who will turn 1 in November.

The couple told stories of their coming out experience. Their families were at opposite ends of the spectrum.

"When I told her, my mom was almost immediately supportive," Holden said. "It may have taken her 24 hours to get over the initial shock, but after that, she has been wonderful."

However, Galluccio's coming out story was much different.

"Imagine the worst coming out situation you can, and that's what happened to me," Galluccio said. "Imagine telling your family that their eldest son of an eldest son of an eldest son is gay. There was crying and fighting and more crying and fighting."

Despite the reaction, after many years, the couple finally was accepted by Galluccio's family.

The change came after Galluccio told his family that if they could not be accepting, their relationship with the child the couple was planning to adopt would be distant.

"I told them, 'You can either be Grandma and Papa or you can be Mrs. and Mr. Galluccio.' After that, I got my parents back," Galluccio said.

The couple talked of internal and external problems they encountered the years before they adopted Adam, ranging from Holden's alcoholism to internal homophobia. They also talked of problems they now are dealing with.

"We do talk to our kids at an age-appropriate level about how they may be treated by others," Galluccio said. "We tell them that some people may be mean because they think that different means bad, but we always stress to them that different doesn't mean bad."

That lesson is what Galluccio hopes students attending the lecture go away with.

"I want people to realize that something that is different from you isn't bad," Galluccio said. "It's as simple as that."

Vendors question usefulness of gas masks as sales rise

BY MICHAEL WATSON AND ADAM CLAYTON

Kansas State Collegian

Army surplus stores across eastern Kansas have reported increases in gas mask sales since Sept. 11.

Alan Wisman, co-owner of Einstein's Outdoor Outfitters, an Army/Navy surplus store in Topeka, said people should be spending their money on flags, not on gas masks.

"When people come in to buy one, we try to talk them out of it. We tell them to buy a flag. Which one will make you feel better?" he said. "A mask would not save their life."

The person would have to carry it around with them all the time.

That's not convenient.

"Masks that you can buy are old and are old technology. Nobody can tell the consumer that the mask will protect them from the chemical."

Don Wiltz of St. Mary's Surplus Sales said gas masks sold out the week after the attack. He said people started buying them when Desert Storm started, but not like now. Since Sept. 11, they have sold three to four dozen, compared to a half dozen in Desert Storm.

"They are sold as novelty only," he said. "There were no English instructions for them. We don't know what they will filter."

Jerry Jaax, associate vice provost, served 26 years in the Army. He conducted extensive studies on medical defense against chemical and biological warfare while stationed at Fort Detrick in Frederick, Md.

Jaax said he does not think a biological or chemical attack is likely, but it is possible. It definitely should be a concern. He said a gas mask would not be practical if an attack occurred.

"If there were an Anthrax attack, you wouldn't know about it for a couple days," he said. "You don't know you're being attacked. The incubation period is a couple of days. With Anthrax up to 60 days."

You can't see anything. You can't feel anything."

The effects of an attack would depend on the agent used. If small pox were used, spreading would be an issue due to social mobility, Jaax said. Anthrax is not contagious, so a person infected with Anthrax in New York could not infect a person in Kansas.

Jaax said Kansas might be targeted if the terrorists were to look into some sort of biological attack on livestock and commodities.

"Kansas is a major producer of cattle, hogs and wheat. We would be much more vulnerable to this type of attack if the terrorists wanted to attack our agricultural and economic infrastructure," Jaax said.

Wisman said the demand for gas masks depends on what people see in the media.

"If people see military in the field using gas masks, that's how they will react," he said. "That's the importance of reading and being educated. People that see things on TV aren't informed."

Wisman said he thinks people should think about it before buying a gas mask for themselves and their children.

"What message is that sending?" he said. "You can't live in fear. That's not what this country is about. It is about freedom."

Gas masks not needed to feel safe in country

During the past month, Army surplus stores have reported increased gas mask sales. The terror from the Sept. 11 attacks has caused some people to think about personal safety and the possibilities of biological warfare.

Jerry Jaax, associate vice provost, said the fear is unfounded. Jaax said the chances of a chemical attack in Kansas are very remote because of the state's small population.

Jaax said the gas masks that people buy are outdated, and often when it comes to biological attacks, the reason bacteria spreads is because people are unaware of having it. Also, he said that for them to be effective, the gas mask must be carried around at all times.

While purchasing a gas mask might seem like the right thing to do to protect yourself, think wisely about this decision. How likely are you to carry around a gas mask? What kind of message are you sending to others?

While it is important to protect yourself and be cautious in these times of uncertainty — as Jaax so wisely put it, it is more important to not live your life in fear. That is when the terrorists win.

Varney's clarifies logistics of Powercat shirt fund-raiser

Editor,
I feel I must respond to the two items in the Campus Fourum printed in Tuesday's Collegian. Both items indicate that Varney's kept $6 out of $10 from the sale of the patriotic Powercat T-shirt that was a fund-raiser for the American Red Cross Relief Fund. It is not true that we kept $6 out of $10.

On Sept. 14, N Zone, a local supplier of garments, approached us with the T-shirt design and indicated that they would donate 500 shirts as a fund-raiser for the relief fund. We thought it was such a good idea we committed to donate an additional 500 shirts with the entire $10 per shirt pledged for the donation. We ordered additional shirts the afternoon of Sept. 14 and were sold out Sept. 15.

We advertised that the full $10 would go to the relief fund, and Sept. 18, we presented a check to the local Red Cross amounting to $20,440, which represented 2,044 shirts. We supplied the Red Cross with documentation to verify the number of shirts we sold.

On Sept. 17, we had to decide if we were going to discontinue the fund-raising. If we continued, the shirts would cost Varney's $3.50 each, and we no longer could absorb the cost. We already had absorbed $5,404 as a cost of the 1,544 shirts we purchased.

At that time, we decided to continue the fund-raising and designate $6.50 per shirt to the relief fund. As of Sept. 30, we sold an additional 19,965 shirts, which at $6.50 each raised $129,772.50 more for the relief fund. The total raised at Varney's is $150,212.50.

All of us at Varney's know we are just a conduit through which, by the generosity of students, community and K-State fans, the funds were generated.

Balancing work and play

30-hour work weeks can benefit Americans

Adam Hayes/Collegian

How many hours do you plan to work each week after you graduate from this fine university? Unless you plan on being a tax accountant in the spring-time, you're probably thinking 40 hours.

Why is this? What is the magic behind working a 40-hour week?

We've been conditioned to think eight hours equals one full day of work. A web site I've found lamar.colostate.edu/~terrell/goals advocates changing the number of hours we work each week from 40 to 30 hours.

The author of this Web site claims the 40-hour work week has led to an increase in scientific discovery, a rise in labor efficiency and even an influx of women in the work force.

However, these increases have come with substantial costs. These costs include stress, exhaustion and even less cohesiveness between families and communities.

A 30-hour week supposedly, would solve these problems that plague our society. The time saving benefits begin by helping the children. It doesn't take an engineer to figure out a dual-earning family will save 20 hours per week. This would allow parents more time with their children.

Communities also would benefit from citizens having extra time. Ten extra hours per week gives many civic do-gooders extra time to volunteer.

Can 30 hour weeks even have a positive effect on the environment? Perhaps. The two extra hours per day could allow some workers to go into work as late as 11 a.m. or leave as early as 3 p.m.

Though the number of cars won't decrease, the amount spent in them will because rush hour will be extended to rush hours and traffic might not be as dense. This would allow traffic to move quickly, thereby making the amount of time an individual spends in his or her car smaller. As engines run less and less, fewer amounts of car exhaust would damage our environment.

Ten extra hours a week surely will cause less stress. Americans would have more time to stop and smell the proverbial roses.

One large hurdle with the shortened work week is, many families would not be able to earn enough wages to support themselves.

There are several types of legislation that can help ease this burden. One is to increase the minimum wage. This would have the greatest impact among lower class families who are struggling to get by.

Also, tax cut legislation could help keep some families afloat. Suggestions include lowering the tax brackets and increasing the standard deduction each individual is allowed to take.

Will legislation like this really support the loss in wages? Probably not. It seems like these arguments are a little too far-fetched.

It all really boils down to whether we want to live a little poorer to have some more free time. Do we want to give up the decrease in productivity to spend more time with our families and friends?

I think, especially in this part of the country, the answer to that question is no. Kansans enjoy taking pride in the work we do and often enjoy working more than a regular 40-hour week.

Still, it's nice to imagine having 10 extra hours to go out and play. Who knows? Another 10 hours might have given me time to think of a better column idea?

Attacks change U.S., create determination

Our nation will never again be the same. That is a redundant, but powerful statement.

When I first came to campus Sept. 11, after learning of the attacks, there was a difference in everyone.

A difference in their eyes, because there was a sense of shock, of intense sadness, anger, perhaps confusion and denial, all rolled into one.

A difference in the sound. Where there once was laughter and constant chatter, voices were hushed.

A difference in the posture and how people carried themselves. People seemed taller. It was almost as if they were walking with more pride. There was an air of refusing to back down.

Since the attack, there have been ribbons of purple and white, and red, white and blue that people have worn to show support.

While stars such as Julia Roberts have donated millions, K-State students, faculty and staff financially gave what they could. Both nationally and locally, there has been a tremendous amount of blood donated.

Local businesses have gone out of their way to make donations. From Varney's Book Store making their patriotic Powercat T-shirts, to convenience stores setting up contribution cans, the majority are doing what they can to help people they do not know. It is one thing for someone to give to a friend, but it is the ultimate act of kindness to generously give to someone who will never know who the gift is from.

On a national level, an article in Friday's edition of USA Today stated a total of $756 million was donated to some of the largest charities and funds set up for victims of the tragedies. The article also said only 795 of the thousands eligible from the attacks received payments totaling $11.9 million.

In addition, Congress has created a compensation fund that could reach $15 billion for families of those killed or injured in the attacks.

Companies such as AOL Time Warner have taken out full-page advertisements in magazines in attempts to inform people about what they can donate. They also have established a Web site, www.Helping.org, to help direct those who are willing to donate.

On Sept. 21, I watched a portion of the $150 million telethon "America: A Tribute to Heroes" concert. Even my obsession for Dave Matthews paled in comparison to the way I felt after hearing some of the stories of those who gave up their lives to help others survive.

Over the last few weeks, we have realized celebrities, actors and professional athletes are not the only heroes.

The real heroes are the innocent passengers on the planes, those in the World Trade Center and the Pentagon who did not deserve to perish. The real heroes had their lives taken away without being enlisted. The real heroes can be found wearing the police badges and fire gear.

Our nation will never again be the same.

We will never again listen to the Star Spangled Banner with the same meaning. We will never again take for granted the importance of the American flag and the powerful image it provokes. We will have even more respect for those who are willing to fight for our country.

We will say we are proud to be an American, damn proud, and we will mean it.

We will still have sadness, anger, even shock in our eyes, but more importantly, a glint of determination. Our posture will continue to refer to the strength and our refusal to back down.

And our purple hearts will continue to combine with the vibrant colors of red, white and blue.

Depot restoration continues; funds needed for completion

BY TARA PATTY
Kansas State Collegian

The Union Pacific train depot is undergoing the second phase of an ongoing restoration project to ensure that the building is not destroyed or left to ruin, taking a chunk of local history to its grave.

"I believe renovation came about because of community interest," said Cheryl Collins, director of the Riley County Historical Museum.

"Individuals and groups have shown some leadership in working toward that end."

The first phase of the project included work and restoration of the foundation of the building. A $500,000 grant from the Kansas Department of Transportation is funding the second phase of the restoration, which includes exterior improvements and removal of hazardous materials.

"The roof has been replaced and support beams in the attic have been repaired," said Kathy Davis, community development director for the city of Manhattan.

The support beams were damaged in a fire in 1981, when the depot was still under the ownership of Union Pacific. Crews also have removed lead paint from the inside and outside of the building and fixed damaged windows and doors, Davis said. Asbestos was removed from the building as well.

This phase of reconstruction will be finished in November, although the building will lack plumbing and electrical systems necessary for use. The project will slow down at that time, pending additional funding.

"We were turned down for an additional grant from the Department of Transportation," Davis said.

The city did not receive the title to the building until 1991, Davis said, so efforts to restore the edifice were not long in coming. Collins said county commissioner Roger Reitz appointed a committee of local individuals interested in the possibility of renovation to look into a possible project during his mayoral term three years ago.

Reitz is part of the committee dealing with the depot renovation, Davis said. The committee has been applying for grants to further fund the project.

"The steering committee is looking at ideas for fund-raising to raise more money for the project," Davis said.

Local individuals and committees have been raising funds to benefit the project as well. One such organization, the Manhattan Riley County Preservation Alliance, has donated over $8,000 to the renovation and is fund-raising to earn more. This is done through the sales of prints of the depot in addition to a historical homes tour.

The Alliance, in association with the Historical Museum, will orchestrate the tour of historical homes in December, and a percentage of the proceeds are given to the depot, said Linda Glasgow, secretary for the Manhattan-Riley County Preservation Alliance. The two will be organizing the tour this year as well.

"There is a lot more work to be done before the building is usable," Davis said.

Possible uses for the building also has been a topic of conversation for interested parties.

Some suggestions include building a war memorial or using the building as a public meeting place, Davis said.

The depot was built by the Union Pacific Railroad Company in 1901. The depot closed in 1972, when the last passenger service on the train went through.

"The Fort Riley Boulevard project was built over the Rock Island

The Union Pacific train depot on Tuttle Creek Boulevard is undergoing the second phase of an ongoing restoration project to ensure that the building is not destroyed.

Railroad and then the mall was built and this further changed the configuration of the railroad," Davis said.

"When the Pillsbury viaduct was built, the configuration was changed even further."

When the railroad was moved to make way for more modern facilities in Manhattan, the track was forced to circumvent the area where the depot was located.

"There are still a lot of possibilities for the depot," Collins said. "I am simply glad the depot will still be standing to be something."

praised the hijackers who flew jetliners into the World Trade Center and Pentagon on Sept. 11.

"The storm of airplanes will not stop," Sulaiman Abu Ghath said.

In a home-front scolding, Bush accused Congress of leaking information about the global investigation into the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks in New York and Washington, D.C.

"You have a responsibility, and some members did not accept that responsibility," Bush said. He warned lawmakers not to talk about troop deployments, either.

In the skies over Afghanistan, U.S. bombs streaked day and night toward sites connected with the ruling Taliban. Sources inside the Taliban said bombs struck around Kandahar, the militia's headquarters, and the northwest city of Herat. Anti-aircraft fire and the roar of jets rattled the capital, Kabul.

Four security workers for a United Nations-affiliated mine-clearing operation were killed during Monday night's strikes. Rumsfeld said it wasn't clear whether U.S. bombs or Taliban anti-aircraft fire killed the men.

In an appeal to the United States, U.N. spokeswoman Stephanie Bunker said: "People need to distinguish between combatants and those innocent civilians who do not bear arms."

Bush was unapologetic.

"There is one way to shorten the campaign in Afghanistan, and that is for Osama bin Laden and his leadership to be turned over so he can be brought to justice," he said.

Four weeks after terrorist attacks killed more than 5,000 and staggered the U.S. economy, Americans still were on edge.

The FBI pressed its anthrax investigation in Florida, convinced that foul play rather than environmental sources infected one man and exposed a co-worker.

Bush called the death an isolated incident. "We're on high alert on the governmental level, but the American people should go about their business," he said.

Rumsfeld declined to identify the targets of Tuesday's assaults, but said meager Taliban defenses were in shambles. Bush called the mission a success so far.

VISAS

programs draw students from other countries.

"Graduate study in the United States is very good," he said. "We have been really satisfied with graduate schools."

Feinstein does, however, plan to go ahead with the rest of her proposal, which includes allocating $32.3 million to a foreign student electronic tracking program that would track students through fingerprints and photographs. It would also require universities to regularly report a student's academic status to Immigration and Naturalization Services.

By law, universities already must keep track of their international students, Davis said. To retain their student visas, foreigners must stay enrolled as full-time students.

But problems arise because of a lack of staffing, training and funds, Davis said. INS is understaffed, and therefore, overwhelmed with paperwork.

And steps also need to be taken to better evaluate who receives a student visa, Davis said.

In many countries, the consulate — the person who decides on visas — has only a few minutes to look over paperwork, interview and grant or deny a visa. The lines to meet with the consulates can stretch for blocks some days.

In Taiwan, consulates take a couple of days to make a decision, said Flora Deng, graduate student in family studies and human services. But, the interviewer asked her few questions, she said.

There are a couple of things that interviewers look for.

Students must prove they are supported by the university they plan to attend and they have an intent to return to their home country.

Proving the latter can be difficult to do, Davis said.

"If someone gets denied a visa it's usually because they fail to show non-immigrant intent," she said. "It's really frustrating. It can be pretty subjective."

To prove non-immigrant intent, students can point out any assets they have, family or how their major is needed in their home country.

In India, Uttarwar said consulates take less than one day to decide on a visa. But he has heard from friends that it now takes one month because of background checks.

Uttarwar and Deng said they support better background checks as long as visas are not arbitrarily restricted.

"If the world wants to have peace, everybody has to understand each other and respect each other," Deng said.

"If more international students come to America, more exchange can be made, culturally and in every aspect. That's how the world should be. Not every country isolated."

Cats face unfamiliar situation

More than any class or program we enroll in, college teaches us how to deal with new and uncomfortable situations.

An example could be getting stuck in an intimidating social situation. For some, it could be walking into class for the first time

my view

David Plous

as a freshman in college. Or you could be the new bartender on a busy Friday night and have no idea how to make any drinks except a Bud Light bottle.

How we deal with these situations often determines how successful we are in our jobs or school.

The K-State football team is facing the same kind of new and uncomfortable situation we have all faced. The Cats are 2-2 for the first time in years. They are the only Big 12 North team winless in conference play. Even Kansas and Missouri have wins.

Instead of being in control of their own destiny in the Big 12 North, as in past years, they are hoping to finish in the top half of the North. Their poll rankings are dropping faster than property value in Kabul.

The last time they lost two straight was the meltdown of 1998 against Texas A&M and Purdue. K-State was a double digit favorite in those games, just like they were against Colorado.

Does Colorado have better talent than the Cats? I say no. The Cats just got outlited, out executed and out coached last Saturday.

Colorado came into Manhattan and just took it to our team physically. They handed the ball to their big tailback Chris Brown more than 30 times and he ran around and through the K-State defense for 114 yards. Brown and QB Craig Ochs took total control of the game.

Defensively, Colorado was dominant despite not having the services of its best player, All-Big 12 linebacker Jashon Sykes. Quarterback Eli Roberson spent most of the day admiring the sky from his back. For an offensive line with so much experience, allowing six sacks (at home no less) is amazing.

The team's execution must improve as well if they hope to stop this losing streak. The defense needs to tighten up the run D. If Colorado can run for nearly 200 yards in Manhattan, what will Huskers' QB Eric Crouch and company do in Lincoln?

What can Head Coach Bill Snyder do about the kicking game? It seems like K-State has about six punter/kickers, all with the range of about 15 yards. Everything I read said getting Jared Brite back was supposed to be the answer, but he banged the extra point off the upright last week. Hey, I heard former Washington Sentinel placekicker Nigel Gruff has a year of eligibility left.

The offense is a different story. They obviously didn't have a good game last week, but the blame doesn't all fall on poor execution. Coaching and play calling have a lot to do with it.

Coming into the season, Aaron Lockett and Josh Scobey were the Cats' biggest offensive threats. Last week, Lockett caught only two balls, while Scobey rushed for a measly 33 yards. And Rock Cartwright, who had a great season last year, doesn't seem like he is even an option this year.

Lockett and Scobey are the seniors — the guys who will put points on the board. Snyder and offensive coordinator Ron Hudson need to find a way to get these guys the ball. By doing so, they not only will get their best players' hands on the ball, they will take pressure off Roberson. The offense lacked excitement to the point my little brother actually fell asleep during the game. Right there in the north endzone, head in his hands — asleep.

The good news is the season isn't even half over yet. Texas Tech is next on the table for K-State. The game will be a challenge. The Cats are a marked team on everyone's schedule, and Tech nearly upset the Cats last year.

You have to figure K-State will pick up the victory. If you think the situation the team is in now is bad, imagine a third straight loss in the Big 12, especially to a team KU just beat.

Bouncing back

K-State looks to rebound with win at Iowa State

BY SEAN PURCELL

Kansas State Collegian

Efforts to establish a stronger presence on the road linger on the minds of the K-State volleyball team after a close loss in Boulder, Colo., on Saturday.

And tonight might be the team's first chance to take that step.

K-State (8-5, 4-3) will make its way north to take on Iowa State (3-9, 0-7), in a match where the Cats will look to bounce back from the loss they suffered against the Buffaloes over the weekend.

"We just want to take it to them," senior Lisa Mimick said. "It is important that we come back and get into a good rhythm."

The rhythm K-State failed to show in Colorado could have been caused by the fact the team had to play catch-up most of the match, head coach Suzie Fritz said.

"They frustrated us," she said. "We didn't dig enough volleyball, and we didn't compete hard enough to win the match."

Fritz said that although Iowa State is a young and struggling team, the Cats have to focus on playing more consistently on the road.

"There aren't any gimmies in this league," she said. "We have to be able to win matches on the road."

Sophomore Cari Jensen, who turned in a career performance at Colorado last weekend, said to be successful throughout the rest of the season, the team will need to work on pursuing the ball better and playing stronger defense.

"We are a pretty strong team all around," she said. "It just comes down to getting better every day."

Fritz said the team is doing well in some aspects of the game, but it is frustrating to see those positives not turn into points and wins in the long run.

"I still feel our systems are good," she said. "I love the way we are passing the volleyball, but it is frustrating to see us pass that well and then not get the kills or have a good hitting percentage."

The Cats have fallen out of a set routine as of late because of the rescheduled match against Nebraska, Fritz said. A schedule of playing one day, then resting the next, then playing the next day is not something the team has been used to, and Fritz said it was good to finally get back to practicing hard and preparing for an opponent with more of a regular routine.

"We felt like we needed to come out and show some enthusiasm in practice," she said. "I feel like we competed well today."

Playing with fire and determination always has been a part of the team's mentality, Mimick said. K-State will look to display that determination tonight against the Cyclones.

"Sometimes you tend to play to your opponents' abilities," she said. "We need to focus on playing K-State volleyball."

Water ski team preps for national competition

BY BEN FEHR

Kansas State Collegian

Powered by a top-three posting in the men's trick ski and men's and women's slalom events, the K-State waterski team edged out the Michigan State Spartans for a first-place overall finish at the Midwest Regional Championships on Sept. 30, in Decatur, Ill.

Finishing first in the 16-team field, the regional championship was the Cats' first ever, a mark which earned K-State a bid to compete at the National Collegiate Waterski Championships this weekend in Tempe, Ariz.

Junior Nick Heckerson, club president and team member, said competing at the national level has been a goal of the team for some time.

"When I was a freshman it was killing the seniors to not be able to make it," Heckerson said. "Ski team alumni have been letting me know how glad they are to see this happen. This was a huge goal for us."

And reaching that goal could produce many additional benefits for the club.

Freshman Julie Voss, who garnished first place honors in the slalom at Decatur, said those benefits are close at hand.

"Nationals will help us to build," Voss said. "I know a number of people who came here to ski before we qualified. This is only going to create more interest."

Although the team currently has only a club status at K-State, building interest and stability can be much easier for a team that has gained national exposure like the team will get this weekend.

Sophomore Dave Dlugosh, who set a regional record of 161 feet in the men's jump at Illinois, said that K-State will face many varsity status teams in Tempe.

"You have to understand," Dlugosh said, "many of the teams we will see in Tempe are backed one hundred percent by their school."

Limited access to sufficient funding can create complications when the Cats' go head to head with teams who wield university spending clout and scholarships, he said.

"We are kind of limited as far as resources and funding goes," Dlugosh said. "It makes things difficult from time to time."

Those obstacles can be easier to overcome if team members are interested in working together to achieve mutual goals.

Heckerson said the the Wildcat ski team is a good example of a group committed to the idea of sharing the work load.

"Of all the years I have been here, this is the tightest knit group," Heckerson said. "Even the freshman we have are coming right in and becoming a part of this. We are in this thing together."

Junior Christine Cammack said existing as a group is part of what makes K-State's team so competitive.

"The team is very close," Cammack said. "I skied for Kansas University my

If the Purina Classic was a one-round event, K-State would have been in good shape.

But after the Cats fired a third-place first round score of 289 at the Classic Monday in St. Charles, Mo., K-State couldn't stay on track and fell to 10th after the second round.

The Wildcats would bounce back in Tuesday's final round to finish tied with Michigan State for eighth in the tournament, but in the end, a second-round score of 296 was K-State's undoing.

"We got off to a really good start," coach Tim Norris said following Monday's second round. "The conditions got very windy during the afternoon, but I didn't think we would drop from third to 10th."

Matt Williams led K-State on Monday, both posting two-round totals of 145 to tie for 23rd after the first round. The two continued playing well on Tuesday, turning in final round scores of 68 and 71, respectively.

Watkins finished tied with Purdue's Peter Karmis for sixth in the tournament, just six shots off the lead, and Williams finished in a three-way tie for 14th, nine shots back of the mark.

K-State's next action is on Oct. 15, at the Crown Classic in Lufkin, Texas.

Teaching by example

Exhibition shows instructors' artwork

BY BECKY FISCHER
Kansas State Collegian

Snakes spill out from a severed chicken head on the floor. Pigs fall from the sky in a painting on the back wall. A locust lays pinned under an image of Osama bin Laden's face.

These are examples of K-State's art faculty work, and they're now on display in the Kemper Art Gallery in the K-State Student Union.

"I like the way the pieces have come together for an interesting show," Teresa Schmidt, associate professor of art, said. "There's definitely a variety of pieces, but they all exhibit talent."

While art instructors dedicate extended teaching hours to their students, they simultaneously must be creating their own work, Schmidt said.

"We probably have the fullest teaching schedules on campus," she said. "We must also continue working on our own art. We're busy around the clock."

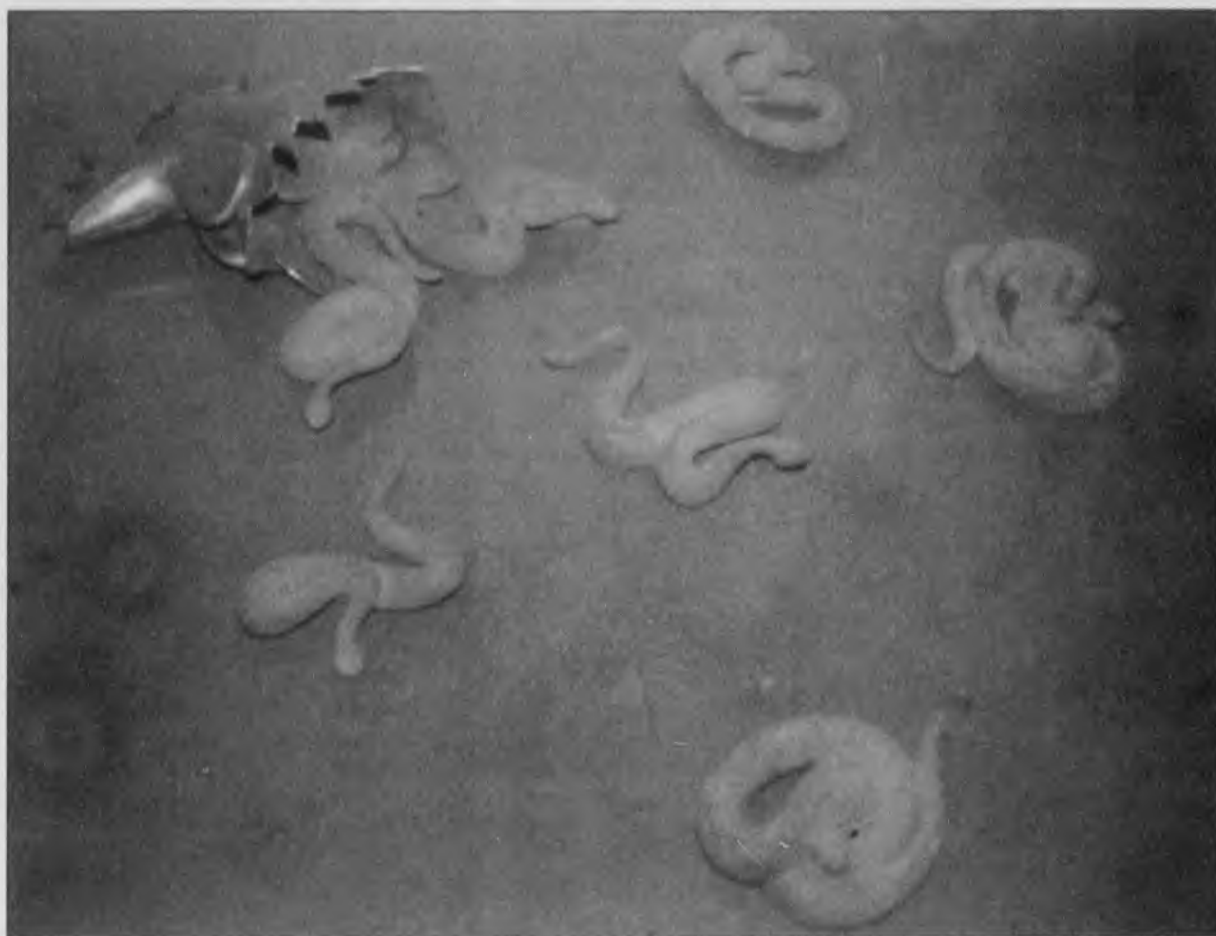

At least once a semester, the faculty gets a chance to display its creativity at the Union, Jim Munce, exhibition committee chairman, said.

"The best way to learn about art is to look at it," Munce said. "This is a chance for students to check out their teachers' work."

What teachers are doing outside the classroom is important for their students, Munce said.

"In order for us to be teaching students, we must be producing work ourselves," he said. "We are active artists, and we try to show our work as much as possible, even nationally and internationally."

The etching piece that

Schmidt selected for this show, "Roberta's New Print," literally was drawn from her teaching experience.

"The people in the piece are my students," Schmidt said. "It can be hard to find outside time to draw, so I decided to work alongside them in this particular case. I just draw whenever I get the chance."

While Schmidt said she enjoys the process of creating, James Swiler, assistant professor of art, said he prefers the finished piece.

"Making art isn't the fun part," Swiler said. "I like it when it's done. But if for some reason I don't like it, I can just tear a piece off or something."

Swiler's acrylic on canvas piece, "9-11" is on display at the Union. He said it's a response to the terrorist attacks Sept. 11.

"The black object in the center is something I found on the road that cars had run over a few times," he said. "I thought it was appropriate to stick bin Laden's face on it."

Each faculty member was given the opportunity to select one piece to display.

"One piece isn't an accurate depiction of my work," Schmidt said, "but it gives students at least an idea of what I'm doing."

Michele Hunt, academic adviser, said she selected her piece, "Fancy Threat," for a couple of reasons.

"I wasn't sure they'd have a large oil painting on display, and I wanted that to be represented," Hunt said. "It's one of my favorite paintings, too. It's just sort of wacky with all the pigs floating around."

The pigs developed through a problem-solving idea, Hunt said.

"Each of my paintings sets me up with a problem," she said. "They start as a horrible mess, and then I get to fix it. It usually happens with a touch of humor, though I never plan for that."

The different styles and media provide students with a learning opportunity, Schmidt said.

"If you don't see a lot of art," she said, "then you don't know what's possible. It can especially be a big influence to see what your teachers are doing. These are the people instructing you."

Great Divide returns to Manhattan on Thursday

BY TREVOR BURGESS
Kansas State Collegian

The Great Divide, a country-based band, will go for broke when they perform at Longhorn's on Thursday night.

The Great Divide, from Perry, Okla., has been together for nearly nine years and have been coming to Manhattan for three. On Thursday they will play songs from their new album, "Afterglow," as well as older material from albums like "Goin' for Broke."

Matt Church, the co-owner of Longhorns, said that once he heard the band, he knew he wanted to bring them to his bar.

"I met them out at the Stampede the very first year they played out there," Church said. "I gave them my name and number and said 'Give me a call,' and we've been bringing them back ever since."

Mike McClure, lead singer, has called the band's style of music red dirt, which is popular mainly in Oklahoma and Texas.

The band got its start playing in small bars around Oklahoma, promoting an independent compact disc, "Goin' for Broke." Since then, they have traveled to Texas and have opened for acts such as Willie Nelson and Chris LeDoux.

Concert info

The Great Divide will play at Longhorn's Thursday night. Doors open at 9 p.m. and tickets are $10 in advance and $12 at the door and are available at Longhorn's.

said, "Let's just do what we do and be true to what we're about." However far that leads us, that's where we're going to go."

After two albums, The Great Divide left Atlantic Nashville, and since then they have a new album under a new label. "Afterglow: The Will Rogers Sessions," is the band's latest album.

They now are under the relatively new Nashville record label, Broken Bow Records.

The single, "Outta' Here Tonight," from their newest album, has gotten air time on Country Music Television and Great American Country. McClure wrote all 10 songs on "Afterglow" and said he got the inspiration for "Outta' Here Tonight" from his wife.

"I remember my wife yelling at me on the phone because she was home with the baby, and I was out having a good time ...," he said. "She calmed down, and I got a song out of it. The good thing about songwriting is you can make things turn out how you want them to."

This will be the sixth time the Great Divide has played at Longhorn's and most of their shows have sold out. Church said the crowds have been big from the start.

"The first couple shows weren't sell-outs, but with songs like 'Pour Me A Vacation,' that were on the radio at the time, they had a pretty decent following," Church said. "Ever since, all the shows have been sold out."

What's the Taliban?

A small band of Islamic militants came to the rescue when an Afghan warlord nabbed a 30-truck convoy from Pakistan seven years ago.

The band was called the Taliban, or "students of Islam." They freed the convoy, shot the hijacker and hung his carcass from the barrel of a tank.

This was the beginning of the militia's relationship with neighboring Pakistan, who nurtures, finances and arms the Taliban.

The Taliban has become far more radical than Pakistan ever anticipated.

It's relationship with bin Laden has led to the world's most extensive training grounds for global terrorism.

When bin Laden was exiled from Sudan for his alleged terrorist activities, the Taliban invited him to Afghanistan. In turn, he gave the organization a reported $3 million for military efforts. With the money and Pakistan's assistance, the Taliban captured Kabul in 1996.

In efforts to control the country, the Taliban has slaughtered civilians and burned houses. Support for the rulers decreased as a result, leading to difficulty in recruiting men into its ranks.

But Pakistan allows recruits from its religious schools and religious political parties to the militia, and bin Laden created and funded an Arab force, attracting Saudis and others. And in the past three years, the Taliban has opened its training camps to would-be terrorists from throughout the Middle East, Africa and Asia.

Now, the Pakistan government doesn't know what to do.

"Pakistan is stuck with the Taliban government," said Ahmed Rashid, a Pakistani journalist who recently wrote an extensively researched book on the Taliban.

"Despite warnings that it has become a monster, the military has not been listening."

Along with 22 years of war, the Taliban's extremist views have led to the devastating state of the country.

Taliban-controlled areas of Afghanistan — about 95 percent of the country — have horrific human conditions.

Women are forbidden to work. They sit in roads and beg for food.

There are even rules on the way a woman can walk: If she walks too energetically, her feet slap too hard on the ground, making an unacceptable noise. Or the fast walking pace could kick up a corner of her burka, showing a glimpse of ankle. Burkas are the head-to-toe, blue garments women must wear.

Barbers are jailed for giving "Titanic" haircuts — the Leonardo di Caprio cut. The cut is a serious offense in the eyes of the anti-Western militants.

In a recent report, the United Nations described the situation in Afghanistan as a horror.

One of every four children die before the age of five, life expectancy is about 43 years, infant and maternal death rates are the second highest in the world, and only 12 percent of the population has access to safe drinking water.

Barely 30 percent of men and 15 percent of women can read or write, and three-fourths of all children have lost a relative because of the Taliban.

Preparing for a post-Taliban Afghanistan

The Northern Alliance, a coalition of ethnic groups fighting the Taliban, is discussing plans for Afghanistan's political future if the regime is toppled.

Abdullah, one of the top civilian officials of the rebel Northern Alliance, predicted the U.S.-led strikes this week and expects the Taliban will be driven out of Kabul and out of power.

But there is uncertainty about the next step.

The U.S. planned military action, Abdullah said, but he's not sure if the U.S. understands the situation in Afghanistan.

"I think they should pay more attention to our situation in Afghanistan, talking about today and tomorrow in Afghanistan," he said.

Senior U.S. officials have been in contact with the rebels but have not embraced them as much as rebel leaders would like.

Abdullah predicts an uprising by the city's residents after the Taliban is forced from Kabul. Under this scenario, the alliance could move its forces into the capital without serious resistance. Then, he said, the alliance would declare the city a demilitarized zone and call for an emergency meeting to form an interim government.

The seizure of Kabul would help U.S. forces box in the Taliban. But Abdullah said he realizes the group might not be able to move farther south to the Taliban stronghold of Kandahar, where Afghan exiles in Pakistan are close and may play a more direct role.

Within the next week, the alliance will meet with a 120-delegate council to discuss the future.

The council will decide the composition of an interim government that might acknowledge the myriad tribes and ethnic groups that make up the nation of 25 million people.

There's a concern the Taliban might be gone before the council arrives.

This would produce a period in which no consensus government exists, possibly leading to more friction among those struggling for power.

Abdullah said the West now faces a choice. Either it will help bring peace and stability to a country that's known 22 years of war, or the world will continue to abandon Afghanistan, he said.

If Afghanistan is abandoned, he said, suffering of Afghans will continue. "The misery of our people will continue. Instability in our country will continue."

LAND GRANT

Coffman said the three responsibilities historically of faculty members are teaching, research and service.

For years, 60 percent of a faculty member's duty would be to teach two or three courses a semester, then 30 percent would be the research — a book, an article — and then 10 percent, service. It could be working for the faculty senate or advising students, Wefald said.

"We came to call that the industrial model, the old assembly line approach where everyone is looked at in the same way," Wefald said.

Wefald said it should be common sense to change this, so the administration did six or seven years ago.

"We started thinking about this individualized model playing to every person's strengths," he said. "The department head would sit down with each and every faculty member. Some are going to have the 60, 30, 10 because they're good at everything."

The administration empowered the faculty, and it put more power into the department heads' hands.

"We aren't trying to run everything," Wefald said. "Department heads have become the central leaders here at Kansas State. If they're empowered to lead and make decisions, we're just going to make a lot more progress."

FUNDING

So what has been holding K-State back from being a top 10 land grant university?

Wefald said the answer to this question is inadequate funds.

"They have since '86, no, since World War II. We've just been inadequately funded — for over a generation now, so they have affected our progress."

"What hurts us on terms of all these things to be a top 10 is that we're funded so inadequately — our OOE and faculty salaries," Wefald said.

OOE, short for other operating expenses, is money used for travel, paper, chalk, computers, sending a faculty member to give a paper or to invite in a scholar to give a presentation.

"Everything you can think about," Wefald said. "That's the kind of thing you need to have a great university. You need to have supplies, you need to have equipment, you need to have research assistance and that's where we've really shorted ourselves as a state over the past almost 50 years."

Wefald said out of the 50 original land-grant universities, K-State probably is ranked 47th or 48th in terms of OOE and 41st or 42nd in terms of faculty salaries. He said K-State is not alone in feeling the effects of inadequate funding.

"KU's in the same position. We're both research universities, and both of us could be doing so much better if we just had average OOE, faculty salary funding. And by average, I mean what the 25th land-grant university has right now."

"We've had many miracles since '86, but we can have even more if we just get, not extraordinary funding — just medium, average, adequate — I know we can get into the top 10. This isn't exactly within our control."

Peter M. A. Sherwood, university distinguished professor and head of the chemistry department, said he agrees with Wefald that faculty salaries are low.

"Absolutely, our faculty salaries are not as competitive as they should be if one looks at where we stand," he said.

Sherwood said he recently attended a workshop where K-State was one of several schools that attended along with Oklahoma State, all the Missouri schools, Colorado State, University of Colorado and others. He said K-State's faculty salaries were lower than all schools besides one — the University of Missouri at St. Louis.

"We work in a competitive society. If we aren't rewarding our faculty, then they will leave," he said.

For OOE, Sherwood said he has $8,000 less with which to work than his predecessor's predecessor had 20 years ago.

"We did make some advances on our peer groups last year, but we're still a long way behind — that's the trouble," he said. "Nobody went into the education field for the money, but it's important to have the right environment to pursue the things you need to."

Wefald also wishes K-State could receive more funding for another dream and goal of his — the proposed new food safety and security program. This building would also assist in the collaboration of different departments and their working toward a common goal.

"If we could have the good fortune to get the state to appropriate the funds for this food safety and security building and then get some help from other areas from like the federal government, that would add tremendous impetus to all of those departments."

"Many of those departments will have a role to play in this building and will help us generate more extramural funding because we're going to be on the cutting edge when it comes to combating agriculture and agribusiness terrorists," he said.

K-State has five land-grant university peers, which are mainly based on similar faculty salaries and OOE. These are Oregon State, Colorado State, Oklahoma State, Iowa State and North Carolina State. With faculty salaries, K-State is at 90 or 91 percent compared to the other five. At OOE, K-State is 57 percent. This means for every dollar Oregon State, Colorado State and the others get, K-State gets 57 cents.

"That's a definite burden," Wefald said. "It's very difficult to do great things if you don't have at least average funding."

Wefald said the national economy is in a recession right now, so he and the administration are not looking forward to much of anything in regards to funding.

"We hope it doesn't last too long, but the OOE, faculty salary components are huge for us to have the funds to reach these goals. They are the means to an end," he said.

Provost Coffman said funding from other areas possibly could help.

"We can leverage those with private giving and with competitive research funds, but if we don't have that base, we have a large problem."

Of course, Wefald said he didn't have these high aspirations when he arrived in '86.

"We just wanted to improve," he said. "We were starting from scratch. It took us literally the better part of at least a decade. We could only even start thinking about being the top 10 in the last couple years."

"We had to turn around campus in every way, shape and form, so a decade later, now, we want to keep going up. We want to keep moving up," he said. "So this is a dream and goal. You have to set high goals if you're going to make progress. That's our goal is to get better every day."

the Wildcats open national competition in sunny Arizona on Friday.

This year's championships, to be played on Tempe Town Lake, are billed to draw some 30,000 spectators per day.

Heckerson said such numbers would qualify this year's nationals as the largest ever.

With or without high fan turnout, though, the Cats believe they are ready to match up with the best the country has to offer. Dlugosh said his team is confident in its ability to ski well.

"We can compete well against teams in our same situation," he said. "And we may surprise some teams who are not in our situation. We are not going to come away from this disappointed."

K-State built on land grant

BY KECIA N. SEYB

Kansas State Collegian

President Jon Wefald's vision: He wants K-State to be a top 10 land-grant university.

Still, some K-State students might wonder — what exactly is a land-grant institution?

"It is like that CRP — like conservation where they pay you not to grow anything on your land," Andy Fahrmeier, senior in construction science, said.

Dave Mengel, head of the Department of Agronomy, said Fahrmeier isn't correct.

"That's completely false," Mengel said. "That's a totally different concept."

Tarl Vetter, sophomore in chemical engineering, said he kind of knows what land-grant universities are.

"If I remember correctly, some government gave them chunks of land to build schools on," Vetter said. "They gave them money."

Although Vetter said he isn't sure exactly which government distributed the land and money for the institutions of higher learning, he was certain it was from within the nation, possibly within the state.

"I'm pretty sure it wasn't England," he said.

Land-grant colleges and universities actually are U.S. institutions that benefit from provisions of the Morrill Act of 1862.

This act gave federal lands to each state for the establishment of colleges offering programs in agriculture, home economics, and mechanical arts, as well as in the traditional academic subjects.

"The central essence of a land-grant university shows a response to an egalitarian theme," Provost James Coffman said.

It was for all the sons and daughters of working America, he said.

Indeed, the role of the land-grant institution was for the common man, Mengel said, in the areas of agriculture, mechanics and home economics.

"Recognize that at the time, most of the colleges were very elite and only the wealthy were able to go to college, so it was for the average folks," Mengel said. "There are three significant roles that each one was given — teaching, research, and extension or education of those out in the countryside — the rural dwellers."

Another provision of the act demanded the establishment of a military training program, which is now part of the Reserve Officers' Training Corps (ROTC) at every land-grant college.

Vermont Senator Justin Smith Morrill presented the bill for the land-grant institutions to Congress in December 1861. It became law July 2, 1862, with President Abraham Lincoln's signature.

Although several schools had officially accepted the Morrill Act provisions, the Kansas legislature was the first to designate a specific college as the state's land-grant institution, Bluemont Central College, which became Kansas State Agricultural College. Therefore, some Manhattanites say K-State was the very first land-grant university.

The Second Morrill Act was passed in 1890, which expanded the 1862 act to include historically African-American institutions.

In 1994, 29 Native American tribal colleges gained land-grant status, bringing the total number of land-grant institutions to 105.

Wefald, however, said he only wants to compete with the 50 original land-grant institutions.

Through the 30 years that he has worked in a university setting, Mengel said the land-grant university has not changed too dramatically.

"One of the things that has been noticeable is that there has been more attention paid to things like the environment and things of more interest to the general population," he said.

Above all, Coffman said a land-grant university has to maintain teaching, research and extension.

The first class was supposed to take place Sept. 11 but was canceled.

The students who attended got to take the recipes from that class

McGraw said there had been almost no advertising since Sept. 11, so he wasn't surprised that few people showed up to what was supposed to be a 25-student class.

"I'm happy," he said. "Small classes are great — they're personable."

The students said they planned on going to the next classes in the coming months.

"If everyone knew they would be getting all this," Huber said, "they would be here."

Dance lessons teach participants about culture

BY JENNIFER FARR

Eight pairs of eyes settled on their instructors' every movement.

Instructors Anna Alcantara, junior in elementary education, and Daniel Sanchez, junior in secondary education, gave free salsa lessons as part of Hispanic American Leadership Organization's participation in Hispanic Heritage Month.

Trying with difficulty to follow their lead while keeping the beat of the music in the background, the faces of Kelli Benton, junior in elementary education, and John O'Hara, sophomore in business management, creased with sweat.

"This is so different than any other kind of dancing because there is a whole lot of shaking going on," O'Hara said. "The hardest part is staying together when leading into the steps."

Salsa dancing is in Hispanics' blood from the moment they are born, Alcantara said. She said to understand the salsa is to understand life itself.

"OK, it's two steps to the left and two steps to the right,"

she said. "Remember to keep those hips moving, guys. Once you've got that down, you are set."

HALO President Blanca Luna, sophomore in biochemistry and Spanish, said the reason for the free salsa lessons was they wanted people to come to the Gran Baile, which HALO is sponsoring, from 9 p.m. to 1 a.m. Friday.

"We want people to be there to help celebrate the ending of Hispanic Heritage Month and actually know how to dance to the music," Luna said.

Hispanic Heritage Month officially is in the month of October. However, Luna said HALO celebrates it from mid-September to mid-October. The purpose of the month is to celebrate the independence Latin American countries gained from Mexico.

"We have such a rich history, and we are really attached to it and try to keep it going," Luna said. "Which explains, in part, why we are having the lessons. Dancing is a huge, huge part of our culture, and we want to share it with people here today."

Christy Agler, junior in kinesiology, said there are many differences between traditional American dancing and salsa dancing.

HALO had salsa dance lessons Wednesday to share the Hispanic culture with other students. The salsa is a blend of European, African and Puerto Rican traditional dances.

"It's a whole lot different style of dancing because it's not like bar dancing at all. You actually have to have talent," Agler said.

"The thing is get into the rhythm and, most importantly, not to fall over your partner's feet."

Donations to community charities decrease

BY MICHAEL WATSON
Kansas State Collegian

Local charities not associated with disaster relief funds for the Sept. 11 attacks are seeing decreases in contributions because of community members and businesses donating to relief funds.

Contributions to Big Brothers and Big Sisters of Manhattan Inc. already were below average at the beginning of the year. Executive director Ken Scroggs said the attacks add fuel to the fire.

"We have seen dramatic decreases in straight donations to us," Scroggs said. Scroggs said future programs could suffer because of the money donated to the relief funds.

"In the future, people who would usually have given to Bowl for Kids' Sake or other programs will have already given to New York," he said.

Scroggs said that if big corporations donate the bulk of their philanthropy dollars relief funds, they won't have money to give to charities like Big Brothers-Big Sisters. With money being raised for the Manhattan Community Foundation, Mercy Health Center of Manhattan and the KSU Foundation, they need more people to donate. Things are tight already, he said.

Elise Lambert, executive director of Habitat for Humanity, said the economy is playing a significant role in contributions to local charities. Volunteers for Habitat for Humanity build a house for a family. The family then pays the organization back over a 20-year period, interest free.

Two weeks after the attack Sept. 11, Lambert said, businesses were hurting. It indirectly affected Habitat for Humanity.

"With our Builder's Club, people that pledge a certain amount of money per house that we build, members said they can't donate," she said.

Habitat for Humanity broke ground Sunday on the organization's 11th house in Manhattan. Lambert said there still were a lot of funds from the Builder's Club. Funds also were raised from Building on Faith, a national event.

The event featured a bell choir and a gospel choir to celebrate Habitat for Humanity. There was a large increase in contribution from previous years.

On Nov. 17, there will be a sign-a-stud sale at the Habitat for Humanity house that is being built.

Lambert said she hopes there will not be a shortage of volunteers to build the house. She said that at K-State, there are groups that call the people who want to volunteer.

Scroggs said Big Brothers-Big Sisters has done more volunteer recruiting than in the past. The number of volunteers has increased since the attacks.

"It puts things in perspective," he said. "It makes them (students) think that partying isn't so important."

While Big Brothers-Big Sisters and Habitat for Humanity have seen decreases in contributions, the Salvation Army Thrift Store in Manhattan has seen an increase in donations since the attacks.

Tami McBryde, co-manager, said people have brought in money and clothing to send to New York. The store did not start a monetary fund, but people came in with money and asked them to mail the funds. The thrift store donated $500.

She said the store has had to turn away clothing.

"We have had to turn people down for two weeks because we are so overstocked," she said.

McBryde said clothing contributions never have been turned down before.

Charities like Big Brothers-Big Sisters depend on funding through giving, grants and city funds.

The United Way is one funding source for Big Brothers-Big Sisters. Scroggs said if the United Way does not reach its fund-raising goal, Big Brothers-Big Sisters could get its funding cut.

Scroggs said he does not blame individuals or companies for sending money to New York.

"This is one of the worst things in the world that could happen," he said.

Police agencies search for terrorist suspects

BY KAREN GULLO
The Associated Press

WASHINGTON, D.C. — Investigators are asking European police agencies to look out for eight suspected terrorists linked to Osama bin Laden. At home, the Justice Department on Wednesday assembled a team of prosecutors from New York and Virginia to work on terrorism cases.

The hunt for the eight comes amid heightened concerns about terrorist attacks against American targets in the United States and abroad. The alert went out via Interpol, an international policing agency.

President Bush announced a list of 22 most-wanted terrorists. It included bin Laden and several people linked to the 19 hijackers who crashed planes into the World Trade Center and the Pentagon.

Concerns about biological attacks lingered as preliminary tests on the anthrax that killed a Florida man last week uncovered a possible match to a laboratory strain of anthrax first isolated in Iowa. A definitive match could take several more days, authorities said. The same bacteria subsequently were found in nasal swabs of two of the victim's co-workers, a man found timeline

The following is a recap of the month since the terrorist attacks.

Sept. 11

Hijacked airplanes crash into the World Trade Center and the Pentagon.

Firefighter Carlos Muniz described the scene: "Some were alive, some were dead, some were badly burned. It just rained and rained soot, and it was dark. When you see cops running, you know you've got no chance."

Fort Riley enters security level Delta — the highest the base has ever seen.

Sept. 12

Thousands of FBI agents begin searching for leads in the world's deadliest terrorist attacks.

Palestinian President Yasser Arafat donates blood for the victims of the attacks.

President Bush condemns the terrorist attacks as "acts of war."

Sept. 13

K-State announces it will cancel its Saturday football game against Louisiana Tech.

A survivor is pulled from the rubble of the World Trade Center.

Sept. 14

The K-State community gathers to mourn the tragedy. "We will persevere. We are Americans, and that is what we do," Student Body President Kyle Barker said at the ceremony.

Sept. 16

Normally, football stadiums would be filled with thousands of fans. But this day, the NFL cancels its games.

Sept. 17

The New York Stock Exchange reopens for the first time since the attacks.

The FBI asks K-State-Salina for names and directory data for anyone receiving flight training since 1996.

Sept. 18

Students, faculty and staff gather for a peace rally sponsored by Ordinary Women. "I believe that America, and the world at large, has already suffered considerably. Declaring war on an entire country for the actions of a few would entail an astounding loss of life," Brooke Lippelmann, sophomore in political science, said.

Protesters burn and beat an effigy of Bush at a demonstration against the United States in Karachi.

Sept. 20

In his address to Congress and the nation, Bush vows a global war on terrorism. "Our nation, this generation, will lift the dark threat of violence from our people and our future," he said. "... We will not tire, we will not falter, and we will not fail."

Sept. 22

Fans sing "God Bless America" at K-State's first home football game against New Mexico State.

Sept. 25

The last standing piece of the World Trade Center is taken down. The seven-story section of twisted metal is a hazard to rescue workers below, but is preserved for possible later use in a memorial.

Sept. 26

Thousands of Afghans storm the abandoned compound of the U.S. Embassy in Kabul.

Heightened security causes Fort Riley to move its classes to K-State's campus.

Sept. 28

More than 5,000 pro-bin Laden protesters protest the possible U.S. strikes against Afghanistan in retaliation for the Sept. 11 attacks in the U.S.

Sept. 30

Afghanistan's sole ambassador to the outside world says bin Laden is being sheltered in Afghanistan by the Taliban.

Oct. 4

Bush announces the United States will try to deliver $320 million in food and medical supplies to Afghanistan.

Oct. 5

The United States and Israel engage in a rare public dispute after Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon says the Bush administration runs the risk of selling out Israel to garner Arab support.

Oct. 7

United States and Britain launch air strikes on military bases and terrorist training camps in Afghanistan.

Bin Laden appears on TV in a videotape recorded before the attacks and made available to Afghanistan's television station.

Oct. 8

Tom Ridge is sworn in as the nation's first director of homeland security.

Oct. 9

Al-Qaeda, the terrorist network of bin Laden, appeals to Muslims everywhere to mobilize for a "jihad," or holy war, against the United States and its interests around the world.

Bush tells Congress it is unacceptable to leak classified information.

The United States mistakenly kills four aid workers — the first independently confirmed civilian deaths in the third day of bombing against Afghanistan.

Oct. 10

Bush unveils a list of the 22 most wanted terrorists.

Officials urge caution by media networks in broadcasting prerecorded communications from bin Laden and associates in case they contain coded instructions for fresh strikes.

K-State graduate students run in Chicago marathon

Two K-State graduate students in accounting competed with about 37,500 other runners Sunday in the 26.2-mile LaSalle Bank Chicago Marathon.

Jaime Schmidt placed 5,848 with a time of 3:41:33, while Joslyn Crum finished 20,250 in 4:42:21.

Schmidt said she did a 3-to-4 month training program working up from six or eight miles to 20 miles. She then tapered off.

"It was good because there were only two long runs during the week," she said. "You slowly worked your way up."

Crum said she had been training since the beginning of May, running four times a week with a long run on the weekends.

"It took a lot of dedication because I was training by myself," Crum said. "Your goal is to peak on the day of the marathon. I only ran up to 20 miles like two weeks before the marathon."

It was the first marathon for the women, but both said they would think about competing in another marathon in the future — after the soreness wears off. Both said they still were sore Wednesday evening.

"I can walk down the street. I just can't go up and down the stairs, but it's getting better," Schmidt said. "I'd heard stories about people being sore, but it wasn't just one spot. Every muscle was sore."

The marathon began at 7:30 a.m. Sunday, starting and finishing in Chicago's Grant Park.

Participants competed for $450,000 in prize money, plus time bonuses. The marathon is open to all runners who can complete the course in less than six hours.

Coop elevator explodes; $127,400 fine proposed

GREENLEAF — Federal authorities have issued 18 citations and proposed a $127,400 fine for the Farmers Coop Elevator Association in response to a fatal grain-dust explosion last April.

The blast at the elevator in Greenleaf, Kan., killed Max Hubbard, 51, of Washington, and seriously injured another man.

The federal Occupational Safety and Health Administration is alleging two willful violations and 16 serious violations at the elevator. The two most serious violations were a failure to remove potentially dangerous levels of grain dust, and a failure to have a written housekeeping program.

The elevator has 15 days to either comply with the citations, meet with OSHA about them, or contest them.

A spokesman for the elevator did not immediately return a phone message seeking comment.

Teacher receives probation for having affair with pupil

LAWRENCE — A former teacher at Southwest Junior High School will spend three years on probation for having an affair with a student.

Scott Ellsworth, 33, "will never be able to teach again," his attorney, Tom Murray, said Tuesday after sentencing in Douglas County District Court.

"Through a very unfortunate lapse of judgment, Scott allowed a personal relationship that was entirely consensual in nature to destroy what was a highly promising teaching career," said Murray, a former member of the Lawrence school board.

Ellsworth, who taught ninth-grade biology, pleaded no contest last month to taking indecent liberties with a child. He declined comment Tuesday.

NATION IN BRIEF

By The Associated Press

Bin Laden broadcast sends possible al-Qaeda message

WASHINGTON, D.C. — Secretary of State Colin Powell cautioned on Wednesday that the statements made by Osama bin Laden's terrorist organization and broadcast on televisions around the world might contain some kind of message.

Powell said analysts were looking at the statements, including the one made Tuesday by al-Qaeda spokesman Abu Ghathit praising the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks on the United States and warning there would be more.

The secretary of state, Colin Powell, appearing on CNN, also thanked the network for limiting its broadcast of the statements.

"I think it's responsible on the part of CNN to shade that a little bit so that we don't have it coming full force at us and with the potential of perhaps conveying some kind of message," he said.

A CNN spokesman said the network will not air live statements from the al-Qaeda organization and will review the messages on a case-by-case basis.

Russian exchange student adapting to U.S. culture

SARAH RICE

Kansas State Collegian

Natalya Sidorovskaya, an international student from Arkhangelsk, Russia, is getting a taste of American life this year.

She came with an exchange program based in Washington, D.C., that sends U.S. students to Russia for a year of studying, while the Russian students come to American universities.

Sidorovskaya, who is studying non-degree business administration, said she is enjoying K-State, even though there are many differences.

"The culture is the biggest difference," she said.

"Kansas is just a very different place than Russia."

One specific difference she mentioned was American eating habits.

"In Russia, we cook a lot more," she said.

"American people are more used to fast food."

Sidorovskaya also said a very popular food in Russia is many varieties of soup, which she has not found here.

She said that despite the differences in culture, social activities seem to be very much the same in the United States and Russia.

"We go out together and meet people, like here," she said.

Her greatest challenge, however, is adapting to the U.S. education system.

Russian students attend lectures throughout the year with only two examinations at the end of the course, Sidorovskaya said.

But here, she has to study a lot more.

"Here, you have to do a lot more on your own," she said. "There are many more tests."

K-State theater grad succeeds as professional actor; appears in TV shows, film

BY ALYSON RALETZ
Kansas State Collegian

Craig Benton still can remember his acting debut in "Tom Sawyer" as an 11-year-old in Derby, Kan.

"And I'll give you that apple core," was his only line.

Benton, now a professional actor, went on to major in theater at K-State in 1982. After graduating in 1986, he moved on to bigger and better things in Los Angeles.

Since then, Benton has performed in films like "The Lawnmower Man" and "Kansas," and TV shows such as, "Married with Children" and "The Young and the Restless."

During his time at K-State, he said he was involved in every production possible, which helped him in future roles.

"I gained a lot of experience at K-State," he said. "There is a weird temptation for my profession. You don't have to have a college education. I am thrilled I chose to get it."

Benton said he was able to learn more about the business with his college education.

"It gave me a solid background, and I learned a lot about the business.

There is no way I could have learned it just from high school."

Benton said he can not pick which of his professional roles is his favorite.

"My favorite role would have to be the next one," he said. "Another job would be great."

As an undergraduate and as a professional, he said he always has had the fear of being a starving artist.

"You never know where your next job is coming from. That's why you always hear the cliché of actors waiting tables to make ends meet," he said.

Benton waited tables and sold cars to support himself in the beginning of his acting career in Los Angeles.

In June 1994, Benton returned to Overland Park, Kan., because he wanted to start a family. He continued waiting tables while acting parttime.

He said he decided to completely pursue acting in December 1994, when he could not find servers to cover his Christmas shifts so that he could spend time with his family.

"I couldn't get them covered, so I told them, 'I'm going to take a leave of absence for my great acting experiment,'" he said. "Well, I never went back and actually quit. Since January of '95, I have made my income from performing."

He not only performs in live theater, but he also speaks in voice-overs for radio and TV work and performs in commercials and company training films.

He enjoys all aspects of performing, he said, whatever the form.

"I really enjoy the immediate response from theater," he said. "You can really get a good sense from the audience if you are doing a good job or not. You also get a steady paycheck.

"But tomorrow morning I have a voice over job. It doesn't matter if I shave or shower. Who wouldn't enjoy that? Also, I will work for about 15 minutes and make $200."

Tom Woodward performed with Benton in K-State productions, and the two have been friends ever since. Both work as professional actors in the Kansas City area and occasionally audition for the same part.

"If it was anyone else but Craig, competition would come first," Woodward said. "With Craig, though, he's my friend first, then he's competition. If I didn't get a role, it better be because he got it."

Woodward said Benton always amazes him with his abilities in auditions.

Local charities in need of donations as relief fund continues

Our hearts are in the right place. Manhattan residents have donated a substantial amount of money to the New York disaster relief funds.

While it is excellent that people are reaching into their pockets and doling out every cent they can to the relief fund, it is important to remember those in the local community who need help as well.

Since Sept. 11, local charities have seen a decrease in donations. With everyone pouring all of their resources into the New York relief, local charities are suffering.

Manhattan is lucky to have so many groups that take care of the different facets of society. Nonprofit organizations and charities for the poor, homeless and abused persons provide numerous services for the community.

The services they provide for these groups will end if their funding continues to dwindle. We think there is a solution to the problem. Instead of giving all the money to New York, give a portion of it to the national relief fund and another portion to a local charity.

The city has shown an admirable amount of generosity toward those in need on a national level. We should divvy up our generosity and contribute on a local level. Need knows no boundaries.

The Collegian's Campus Fourum is an anonymous call-in system that allows readers to voice their opinions on topics relevant to the publication.

This is to the ladies of K-State — I would like your advice. There is this cute girl in one of my classes I would like to meet, but I am pretty shy. I was just wondering if you had any suggestions.

Why do they call it the gay lifestyle? I am gay, and the only lifestyle I have is that of any college student who is stressed out and wishes he could drink more beer.

Yes, could we get toilet paper in the Union that actually dispenses?

I just bought panties at Victoria's Secret. You can get a whole lot of them for $5,000.

Why am I the only one the squirrels bum cigarettes off of?

I feel better knowing my panties are protected by the police. Thanks for arresting those villains.

Did anyone else enjoy the ESPN national jump rope competition aired last night?

Rather than wasting money on razors, I just use the dorm toilet paper to shave.

Hey, was it me or was Dennis Miller wasted on Monday night football?

Why the heck was there a helicopter outside my sixth floor room Monday night at Marlati?

Way to go ATO for illustrating a point independents have been making for years. You should not have sent your boys out on a harmless prank driving drunk. Even greets are not immune from DUIs. Shame on you and your irresponsibility.

I believe the fourum was created to foster disunity among the students.

I don't think our kicker is a weak link — more like a missing link.

This is in response to give your tickets up to the true fans — true fans would already have tickets.

It is a sad day when guys can't go on a panty raid without the fear of being charged with aggravated burglary.

Wouldn't it be a little redundant trying to bomb Afghanistan back into the stone age?

University workers contribute to growing campus beauty

Editor,

Every day I walk by Leasure Hall on the way to my office. The flowers out in front are wonderful. Thank you to the planners and planters and waterers and weeders. At this time each year, as the campus comes alive with fall colors, I realize how many people work behind the scenes to support our lives as teachers, researchers and students at K-State.

Hundreds of hard-working people plant and maintain the outdoor landscapes, prepare and serve food, clean and maintain buildings, type and file, and keep in order millions of pieces of data and manage all of our financial, technological and human resources. In short, they provide the person power that makes possible our education, research and service missions.

I want to acknowledge the vital role of these many support workers and express my appreciation for their contributions. In many cases, these colleagues are like the elves who help the shoemaker during the night, but disappear in the morning. They do their jobs inconspicuously. They keep a very low profile.

In fact, the test of whether they have done a good job is that most of us don't notice the work at all. And yet, these clerical, maintenance and service jobs are so essential that the rest of us could not do our work without them being consistently and competently done.

Thank you to all of the valuable workers at K-State who support the mission of the university every day by your untiring contributions in every unit on campus. You are the human resource foundation of all of the great accomplishments that have and will come out of K-State.

Respect for religion

Tolerance of different faiths paves way for peace, love

As ground and air bombs combine to rock the world with explosions, the ranks on the home front are espousing tolerance.

Do not be fooled. Hypocrisy abounds.

We are saying this is not a religious war, but everyone knows religion lurks in the background. It might not be called a war against Muslims, but Osama bin Laden sure seems to think it is a war against Christians, whom I read he called "sinners."

Americans say this negative treatment toward Eastern religion is an outcry. We grew up hearing about how distressing the Israeli-Palestinian conflicts were. But we in the West have our own religious wars raging. No one ever seems to notice the religious conflict that so many Americans bring upon their fellow citizens.

Somewhere along the way, the concept of religious tolerance has been trodden upon.

This is a primarily Christian nation. Christianity's foundation rests upon the ideals of love and acceptance of our fellow human. Yet, we still hear stories of people who kill, beat or verbally abuse others in the name of God.

This week, National Coming Out Week, provides the perfect example. I don't care what you think about the gay lifestyle. I could not care less whether your source of reference is the Bible or God in Heaven. Nobody has the right to abuse a gay person in any way, even if his or her religion dictates homosexuality is immoral.

Sure, everybody has the right to have his or her own opinions about issues like homosexuality. These views can be freely discussed at home, in the press or among friends. There is nothing wrong with starting an intelligent discussion with a stranger.

But no one has the right to force his or her views on another person. And no one will ever be justified in harming another person for religious reasons.

Tolerance is a concept Americans have yet to master. I don't think people who toss the term around like a beloved pigskin really know what it means. When it comes to religion, tolerance goes far, far beyond talk about Israeli-Palestinian conflict in the East.

It's about letting others believe and act the way they want. And — this seems to be the kicker — not getting in their faces about it.

We all have seen the strife that occurs on our own soil between people of different faiths. Too many Buddhists, Muslims and Jewish people lead misunderstood lives.

I know someone who grew up with a Jewish father and a Christian mother. He said he was made to feel excluded from both sectors of town. How silly is it that an innocent little boy was unaccepted by members of his own community? It's not like we get to choose our parents. They often are the reason for our choice of faith, at least when we are young.

If you think this is ridiculous, consider the opposition between Christians. Everyone has seen examples of people from different denominations sparking and encouraging conflict.

What happened to loving your neighbor? If anybody should be considered your neighbor, it is someone who has similar fundamental beliefs as yours.

One time, I was sent to write a news story about a religious speaker. After his sermon, he and the pastor cornered me and accosted me because I did not belong to the same denomination as them. Their "talk," which began as simple chitchat, became confrontational.

It was fine for them to discuss their grim visions of my future among themselves. It was not acceptable, however, for them to keep me from doing my job. This was neither love nor tolerance.

It is wonderful when people share their personal religious joy with others. This does not mean they can harass, harangue or spin dark, threatening tales of doom to their faces.

This is a time of terror, confusion and abrasion. The last thing we need to do is promote strife on our own turf.

Religion is a choice everyone should be allowed to make without the unwanted or disconcerting coercion of others.

Consumer optimism essential for recovery of U.S. economy

When I received my statement in the mail, I literally went cross-eyed. For a moment, I panicked and looked away.

After a long, steady breath, I searched the numbers representing my Roth IRA fund.

I figured once my eyes had settled upon the earnings statement of my portfolio, the dwindling numbers before me somehow would readjust themselves into a profit.

Many Americans are panicked because of our economic state.

Lately, there has been reason to panic: unemployment is rising. The airline industry is losing millions of dollars and customers. The Dow Jones Industrial Average reached a closing low the week ending Sept. 21, falling an estimated 14.3 percent.

These economic issues are highly visible in my IRA statement. All stocks, no matter their level of risk, have been negatively affected.

As I processed all the minus signs preceding my "earnings," the fear and panic subsided.

Susan Powell

Why? Because I have history and American resilience on my side.

According to research done by MarketHistory.com, the stock market has taken a loss after each major American crisis. Some of the crises cited: Sinking of the U.S. battleship Maine in 1898, the attack on Pearl Harbor in 194 and the bombing of the Alfred P. Murrah Federal Building in Oklahoma in 1995.

All of these tragedies correspond with a slump in the economy. On average, a week after the events the Dow was down 3 percent. Historically, as little as two weeks later, the Dow was on the rise, improving to minus 2.1 percent.

Even more reassuring, six months after said events, the stock market actually was gaining stability and profit. The average increase is 11.3 percent, and within a year, as much as 18.4 percent.

Thankfully, U.S. citizens aren't expected to wait patiently as the stock market naturally regains stability. President Bush has been negotiating new bills and tax cuts with Congress.

According to www.CNN.com, a $60 billion increase in government spending has been approved by Congress. This additional spending will be used for disaster relief, as well as aiding the airline industry and those who are unexpectedly unemployed.

The monetary injection into our wilting economy will not stop there if Bush can convince Congress to enact another $60 billion of tax cuts.

The tax reductions Bush wishes to offer in the bill include the acceleration of cuts in income tax rates not scheduled to take effect until 2004. He also would like to provide more tax relief for low and moderate income Americans, through rebates of payroll taxes. A third option would allow businesses to take "enhanced expensing" of capital spending, which greatly would increase business investment in new equipment.

Although Republicans naturally are wary of spending and Democrats of tax cuts, there have been great efforts to compromise on an economic stimulus package.

Two popular suggestions from Congress involve increased air travel and the purchase of bonds. One suggested tax credit involves traveling at least 100 miles from your home, "just for fun." If a taxpayer can prove this, he or she will receive a tax credit.

The Treasury Department is issuing savings bonds with patriotic labels, such as war bonds, victory bonds and unity bonds. Such bonds give our government more funds to work with, enabling our economy more spending power.

With such large increases in government spending and tax cuts, one might wonder exactly how much the relief efforts will cost. House Minority Leader Dick Gephardt said, "Every dollar that you give in those benefits gets spent immediately and helps the economy move forward and recover."

Basically, we need to rally as a country in optimism. Our perceptions of the economy are the greatest affect on the stock market and our economic welfare, as well.

We're Americans. Historically, our resilience is apparent and continues to thrive, no matter what our bank or IRA statements might suggest.

pared, unorganized and whining like a baby before an audition," he said. "I don't know what he does, but then he turns on in an instant and does a phenomenal job."

Kate Anderson, director of theater at K-State, said she has invited Benton back to Manhattan in November to teach an acting seminar. This will be the fifth time he has been invited as a featured alumnus.

"He's just had so much experience," Anderson said. "The students enjoy him because he is so personable and willing to share information. It is good for them to see a professional actor who made it from K-State."

She cast Benton in several plays during his four years at K-State and has kept in touch with him since his graduation. She said he is a versatile actor who can tackle many roles.

"He was usually cast in a lot of dramatic roles," she said, "but he had a wonderful flair of comedic timing and physical comedy, which is what he is doing more of in Kansas City now."

She said that during her instruction, she realized he had the drive and determination to become a professional actor. Besides his positive attitude, she said, he is an overall likable guy.

"He's a person who is serious about his work, but he is a nice human being, which is important" she said.

Benton said he enjoys returning to K-State to teach the seminars because he has a lot of advice for aspiring actors.

"Don't think you can just do this for fun," he said. "Only do this if you have to do this, if it's in your blood. Desire doesn't get you hired."

infected last week and a woman identified Wednesday. Investigators regard the anthrax discovery in Florida as a criminal case. They have found no links to terrorists or the 19 hijackers.

Attorney General John Ashcroft picked federal prosecutors from New

In the past, prosecution of terrorism cases has fallen to individual U.S. attorney's offices. The Sept. 11 attacks case, however, will fall under Assistant Attorney General Michael Chertoff, head of the department's Criminal Division.

Doing their best ...

K-State's offensive line has struggled so far this season to protect sophomore quarterback Eli Roberson. The Cats surrendered a season-high six sacks in a 16-6 loss to the Colorado Buffaloes last weekend at KSU Stadium.

WITH WHAT THEY HAVE

Makeshift line struggles to protect quarterback

BY MICHAEL NOLL

Kansas State Collegian

Following K-State's offensive performance against Colorado, in which it amassed only 74 yards rushing and 122 yards passing, Coach Bill Snyder's evaluation was easy.

"Do we need to run the ball better? Most certainly," he said. "We need to throw it better, too."

Several factors played into the Cats' lowest offensive output since they played Colorado in 1999, but primarily the stagnation was mental, offensive lineman John Robertson said.

"It was probably our lowest performance so far in the season. Statistically, we didn't, all across the board, have a game that we wanted to have — we didn't have the game we needed to have to win the ballgame," he said. "There's probably a lot of factors that contributed to that — underestimation of Colorado, probably mainly. Not preparing the way we needed to prepare that week and not having the right mentality to go out and play the game."

Getting back on track, then, would seem easier against Texas Tech, which ranks last in the Big 12 Conference in scoring and rushing defense, allowing 30 points and 217 yards rushing per game. Those numbers, though, no matter how dismal, make no difference to the Cats.

"In my last four years here, I've seen teams with the worst rushing defense come to play," offensive lineman Steve Washington said.

Regardless of past statistics, though, K-State needs to get its offense going again. Doing so starts on the offensive line, which gave up six sacks — just three less than K-State allowed all of last season. The team also fell far short of its goals of 200 yards for both rushing and passing. Preventing a repeat situation in Lubbock doesn't require scheme changes, though, Robertson said.

Kelly Glasscock/Collegian

Senior wideout Brandon Clark makes a catch against Colorado last week. The Cats' receiving corps has been limited to short gains this season as K-State's offense has struggled early.

"The schemes that have worked are the ones that have worked ever since Coach Snyder first got here, and nothing is going to change that," he said. "Defense is always going to be the same. It's execution on the individual party, each person going out and doing what they need to do and getting it done."

"We have been working on a lot of fundamental work and being assignment sound. Coach Snyder always says that fundamentals win the ball game so that is what it pretty much comes down to. We have also been working on communication between the players on the offensive line."

The offensive line is fighting an uphill battle, though, because of injuries. As a result, players must play different positions according to who is healthy that week.

"Andy Eby's played five positions, and there are only five on the offensive line," offensive coordinator Ron Hudson said. "I've made it common information to you that we've been trying to keep these guys together with Scotch tape, and that's what we're doing right now."

"You don't get that consistency. You don't get that feeling of the guy next to you knowing exactly what's going on from the standpoint that when you have spent a lot of time together working through these things, you have a pretty good feel of what the guy next to you is doing. If you don't recognize him, sometimes that's a problem."

Despite the difficulties, the pressure is on for the line to improve against Texas Tech, Washington said.

"They're just a regular basic defense, and just as long as we execute, follow our rules, and have faith and just don't let these two losses affect us because we're going into a hostile environment, and we need to handle ourselves," he said. "The key word this week is 'execute.'"

The story behind the sacks

K-State's offensive line has been suspect this season, giving up nine sacks in its first four games, equaling the total from just a year ago. The struggles up front were never more apparent than against Colorado, as the Cats gave up a total of six sacks, all in the second half. Cats adopt new style; receivers struggle early

BY MICHAEL NOLL

Kansas State Collegian

If fans thought they had seen few short passes from the K-State offense, it's because they haven't.

Over the past four years, the Cats have become notorious for quick-strike scoring drives that often include a long pass play. Former receivers Darnell McDonald, Quincy Morgan and Martez Wesley didn't run very many short routes, and that pattern has continued with this season's group.

Until the Colorado game, the deep routes had worked well. Against the Buffs, though, K-State completed only 11 passes, and, because of the cushion given to Cat receivers by the Colorado secondary, just two of those completions went for over 20 yards.

"We're a team the last three or four years that has gone deep virtually every play, with Darnell and Quincy and myself and Martez. The average yards per catch was 18-19 yards per catch," senior Aaron Lockett said.

"We're not a team that's used to going short game, but after a while, teams are starting to focus on our deep ball, and they're just starting 10 yards off, 12 yards off, and we're still trying to go deep, and I think that's our fault. So we've got to change it up a little bit in order to get what we want."

Changing the game plan to incorporate a shorter passing game isn't necessarily easy, though. K-State has used quick routes in practice, but the Cats just haven't been a priority during the actual game. Then, once the team gets ahead by a significant number of points, the passing game gets ditched all together.

"It's something that we definitely need to redevelop," Lockett said. "We've done it through out practice, but definitely translating into the game is something different because we're used to getting a big play here, a big play there. I think once you get up 14, 17 points, then I think our defense kicks in, special teams kick in, and before you know it, the game's over."

After their struggles against Colorado, however, the Cat quarterbacks won't necessarily start using three-step drops, offensive coordinator Ron Hudson said. Instead, the coaches will base their game plan off of what Texas Tech shows.

"The most important quarter in a football game is the first quarter because you have to determine what their game plan, and then you try to fit things in," Hudson said.

"If they're doing a certain thing, you kind of use that with what you have in your package and then work around that."

K-State fans' criticisms short-sighted, immature

According to popular belief, the best job in the world is that of second-string quarterback.

Everybody loves the backup. During Jonathan Beasley's first season as the starter for K-State, the fans wanted Adam Helm. Then, when Helm started against Texas, his ineffective play showed why he was second string, and Beasley ran back on the field to loud cheers.

Last season, fans clamored for Eli Roberson instead of Beasley, and the same thing happened.

"I remember distinctly when people were down on Jonathan Beasley, and Eli Roberson goes into the game, and there's a big cheer," K-State offensive coordinator Ron Hudson said. "That's the general nature. People want something that isn't always there. They want the best possible result on the field, and people tend to lean on the quarterback a little bit more than everybody else."

It would seem, then, that fans would learn their lesson — trust the coaches, who almost will always start the best player. But fans are stupid, evidenced by the K-State crowd's reaction to Roberson in the Colorado game.

Roberson had a stellar performance against Oklahoma a week earlier, but he struggled all day against Colorado. Then, on the game's final play, Roberson limped off the field, and backup Marc Dunn took his place — all to a big cheer.

As a result, it's obvious that second-string quarterback is not the best job in the world. That honor belongs to being a college football fan, especially at K-State.

Usually, people are required to defend what they say. Thus, when one fan booed the Cats and then followed up with the comment that K-State "would need a magic crack-pipe to get out of this one," he would have had to back that statement up. That was impossible, though, as there were no pipes of any kind in the stadium, and that fan should have shut his mouth. He didn't.

The same goes for the myriad fans who eloquently called certain play-calls terrible and said Roberson sucks. Many of these people, of course, were ready to give Roberson the Heisman trophy one week earlier. The same fans also booed Roberson when he tried to audible, thereby not only showing a tremendous lack of class but also preventing the rest of the offense from hearing the audible.

Most well-spoken fans also criticized these people with the following comments: Hudson (his play calling sucked), the offensive line (they sucked), the punter (he sucked), the kicking game (it sucked) and

The Cryptquip is a substitution cipher in which one letter stands for another. If you think that X equals O, it will equal O throughout the puzzle. Single letters, short words and words using an apostrophe give you clues to locating vowels. Solution is by trial and error.

Folk singers will bring sound to arts center

BY LAYTON EHMKE
Kansas State Collegian

The BirdHouse Concert Series will bring two main stage folk performers to Manhattan this weekend. BirdHouse has a reputation for featuring the best national touring song writers, BirdHouse coordinator David Kamerer said. On Friday, John Gorka and Jeff Black are scheduled to perform their own songs acoustically at the Manhattan Arts Center. "This is one of the most exciting opportunities we've had," Kamerer said. "BirdHouse is unique to Manhattan because it is a community event. We pay tribute to the art of song and song writing." Gorka and Black are expected to bring a larger than usual crowd with their humanistic style, Kamerer said. "People will remember John Gorka's voice, and his high level of song writing. His sense of humor seals the whole package," he said. "Gorka is not afraid to write positive songs of hope. That's what people should be listening to right now." Kamerer said people will have the unique opportunity to be part of the intimate exchange that occurs between performers and their audience. "Jeff Black's style is gritty and bluesy. He is very appealing to the audience," Kamerer said. Steve Martini, BirdHouse coordinator, said both performers are impressive. "Black is very talented, and his writing style is very complicated. He is a great writer who plays piano, harmonica and guitar," he said. "These performers are excellent and at the top of their style." Martini said BirdHouse provides a respectful atmosphere and intimate setting, which makes it easier to relate to the artists, not like a rock show. Black said touring and playing live shows is his way of exchanging energy with the audience. Black will play an opening set for Gorka. "Playing live is a beautiful risk," he said. "There's no going back to change anything. "Everyone brings with them what they will. I hope people take home something that they hadn't thought of before." Black said his style of performance doesn't worry about any sort of posturing. "No frills, no posing, and very real. There is no star trip going on," he said. "There's no makeup or fog machines or light shows." The experience is as much for him as it is for the audience, Black said. "Gandhi said something like, 'Every night I die, and every morning I'm born again,' which is what it's like when I play live. Everything is new again."

Folk concert

John Gorka and Jeff Black will perform as part of the BirdHouse Concert Series at 8 p.m. Friday at the Manhattan Arts Center. Tickets are $15 and are available at the arts center, the Dusty Bookshelf and Claffin Books and Copies.

Jazz director to perform in music series

BY JJ DUNCAN
Kansas State Collegian

In the tradition of programs like the BirdHouse Concert Series at the Manhattan Arts Center, the Swing City Jazz Series brings jazz to Manhattan. Wayne Goins, program organizer, will be the featured artist in Saturday's performance and will be backed up by Swing Machine, a group made up of K-State students. The concert will be at the arts center. The program will give more depth to the music available in Manhattan, Goins said. "It's a wonderful thing for the Manhattan community," he said. "Adults don't have any good places to go to hear jazz, and this is it. The arts center is well respected, people know they support the arts." Goins, who is on the arts center board of directors, said he brought the idea of a jazz series to the board during the summer. Goins, K-State jazz director, said he wanted to have a jazz version of BirdHouse. "My first goal is to make this as popular as the BirdHouse series," he said. "I want to make it so popular that it's not just local artists performing, but also regional artists and some cats from Kansas City who I know that are excellent musicians." Penny Senften, interim director of the arts center, said the jazz series will complement the programming already in existence. The venue is convenient for people who don't want to experience music in a bar environment, and it is appropriate for the size of the concert, she said. "It's not too big of a hall and with something like jazz, a big concert hall is very impersonal," Senften said. Curtis Oberle, graduate student in applied music, said the program gives jazz students a chance to reach an off-campus audience and gives students a chance to hear the performers in a public setting. Oberle will play guitar in the concert and has been studying jazz guitar with Goins for more than a year. Though he has been playing jazz for more than seven years and has been a lifelong fan, Oberle said Goins has been a very helpful instructor. "He's taught me new ways of listening to and responding to the music itself," he said, "and he's helped me achieve the technical ability to make an abstract idea into music." The performance will be accompanied by a barbecue dinner at 7 p.m., an hour before the concert. The dinner will cost $9. Goins said the night hopefully will draw a large audience. "It's a chance to sit back and listen to jazz and have a decent meal at the same venue," Goins said.

Swing City Jazz

Wayne Goins and the Swing Machine will be featured in the Manhattan Arts Center Swing City Jazz Series at 8 p.m. Saturday at the Arts Center. Tickets are $5 for students and $10 for the general public and are available at the Arts Center, Claffin Books and the Dusty Bookshelf.

the officials (those @&$%& sucked). Various other expletives were mixed in.

Fans cursed at players all day, secure in the fact that they were free from disciplinary action. If any of the coaches, players or reporters, though, would have told the fans or officials they sucked, there would have been plenty of fines and firings.

Thus, K-State football fan is the greatest job on earth. First, there apparently are no restrictions on obscenities. K-State fans are notorious for booing and swearing at opposing teams, even when they run on the field during the fight song, "Wildcat Victory."

Second, there is no prerequisite team knowledge. Any yahoo with enough money to purchase a ticket also buys permission to rant and rave at the team. It is not uncommon to see a person call the Cats' run defense pitiful and then, in the next breath, ask who No. 56 is. It's Terry Pierce, by the way.

Third, there is no mandatory education about the game. The coaches had to rise through the ranks of high schools and junior colleges. The players had to earn a spot on the team. The officials had to take tests and are reviewed after every game by the league office.

The fans simply have to drink enough beer or possess an obnoxious enough personality to shoot their mouth off indiscriminately.

Nevertheless, there is a certain T-shirt floating around Manhattan with the words "Home of the best college football fans in the world" written on it.

After the fans' display at the Colorado game, however, perhaps the shirt should read differently — "K-State's fans are terrible."

Media serves community, former senator says

BY TANNER EHMKE
Kansas State Collegian

Paul Simon, former Democratic senator of Illinois, returned to the home-state of one of his greatest heroes, Kansas legend William Allen White, to remind the media of their chief responsibility — service to the community.

People in newspapers, radio and television have an obligation to serve their readership, he said in his delivery for the second-annual Huck Boyd Lecture in Community Media on Wednesday in Forum Hall in the K-State Student Union.

Simon, a former newspaper publisher and presidential nominee, called on the media to offer more substance and entertainment, to be tougher editorially and to provide more international coverage.

"People who look to serve end up helping themselves," he said. "If they look at the interests of the community, they will do well financially."

Prior to Sept. 11, the nation was absorbed with news of Rep. Gary Condit, D-Calif., and what he did or did not do, Simon said. All the while, there are 43 million Americans without health insurance. Similarly, the O.J. Simpson trial received more than three times as much press coverage as the fall of the Berlin Wall.

The press panders to people other than the public, he said. Following the bottom line and allowing auditors to dictate the news is pandering to private interests without the public in mind. The Media must exercise their strength in editorials by putting teeth in their messages, such as listing the names of politicians who voted for or against the public's interests.

"Public officials and the public will pay attention," he said.

More international coverage also is needed for a healthy democracy, he said. The United States is ranked last among the developed worlds in percentage of national income devoted to helping third-world countries. Now it has asked other countries to respond to the tragedies in New York and Washington, D.C., he said.

However, he said the United States must realize how often it has come to the aid of other countries.

"We must help the poor beyond our borders," he said. "We know instinctively our lives are intertwined."

Anne Brockhoff, Huck Boyd's granddaughter from Fairway, Kan., said Simon has a unique perspective on the world because of his public service. The goal of the lecture series is to bring people of his caliber and intellect to the university.

Nadia Rutayisire, freshman in pre-medicine, originally from Rwanda, said Simon's views are greatly needed in the United States.

"He was the first American I have heard talk of international relationships," she said. "That is not common among Americans."

Terrorism timeline

A look at the terrorist attacks the U.S. has seen on its own soil.

Source: abc.net

President keeps eye on Hussein

BY RON FOURNIER
The Associated Press

WASHINGTON, D.C. — President Bush said Thursday night it might take a year or two to track down Osama bin Laden and his terrorist network in Afghanistan, but asserted that after a five-day aerial bombardment, "we've got them on the run."

At a prime-time news conference at the White House, Bush said he did not know whether bin Laden was dead or alive. "I want him brought to justice," he said of the shadowy figure believed behind the terrorist attacks in New York and Washington that killed 5,000 people one month ago.

Bush, at times forceful, emotional and funny, looked confidently beyond his war with the Taliban regime and suggested that the United Nations help rebuild Afghanistan with help from the United States. He warned other terrorist-harboring nations that they might be next, with an ominous nod to Saddam Hussein's Iraq.

"We're watching him very carefully," he said of Hussein, defeated by Bush's father in the Persian Gulf War. Some Bush advisers want to turn next against Hussein, whom the president called an evil man.

Despite the aerial pounding, Bush held out a carrot to the Taliban rulers of Afghanistan harboring bin Laden. "You still have a second chance. Just bring him in and bring his leaders and lieutenants and other thugs and criminals with him."

Bush spoke at the first prime-time news conference of his presidency, but more importantly, one month to the day after terrorist attacks in New York and Washington murdered thousands, damaged the nation's economy and shattered its complacency.

In the month since, the president has labored to construct a foundation for an international war on terrorism, moving to choke off the funding essential for terrorists to carry out their strikes, lining up support from other nations, creating a new Office of Homeland Security and — beginning Sunday — unleashing the nation's military.

Terrorists see justification in acts

BY NANCY FOSTER
Kansas State Collegian

Editor's note: This story is intended to provide readers with a researched view into the psychology of terrorism. The sources of information are listed at its conclusion.

Sept. 16, 1920 — A TNT bomb planted in an unattended horse-drawn wagon exploded on Wall Street opposite the House of Morgan, killing 35 people and injuring hundreds more.

On Jan. 24, 1975, a bomb set off in a New York City bar killed four people and injured more than 50 people.

A bomb planted in an underground car park at the World Trade Center Feb. 26, 1993, left six dead and 1,000 injured.

And on April 19, 1995, a car bomb exploded outside of the Oklahoma City federal building, killing 168 and injuring 600 others.

All four of these were acts of terrorism, and all four were in the United States.

But the worst was yet to come. Sept. 11, 2001, marked the worst terrorist attack the United States had ever seen on its own soil. Two planes crashed into the World Trade Center and one into the Pentagon. The death toll has risen to 768 and the number missing to almost 5,000.

"These acts of mass murder were intended to frighten our nation into chaos and retreat," President Bush said to a grief-stricken nation that tragic Tuesday. "But, they have failed. Our country is strong. A great people has moved to defend a great nation."

Bush took action and declared war — not against a country, but against terrorism.

"This is our calling. This is the calling of the United States of America," Bush said of the anti-terrorism campaign. "Terrorists live in the shadows under the cover of darkness. We will shine the light of justice on them."

But what defines terrorism? And what motivates people to go to such extremes? These questions are no longer foreign to Americans, for when the attacks hit home, so does the need for answers.

Definition

Terrorism is defined as the calculated use of violence or the threat of violence to create fear; intended to coerce or to intimidate governments or societies in the pursuit of goals that are generally political, religious or ideological.

In the United States, there are two types of terrorism — domestic and international.

Domestic terrorism involves groups of individuals whose terrorist activities are directed at the U.S. government or population without foreign direction.

International terrorism involves groups or individuals whose terrorist activities are foreign-based and/or directed by countries or groups outside the United States or whose activities transcend national boundaries.

Motivation

But what would cause a group to pursue terrorism to achieve their goals?

Many terrorists are genuinely convinced that their cause, whether associated with their ethnic, religious, economic or ideological convictions has been systematically betrayed and exploited by powerful and vicious forces.

Terrorists, thus, appear to feel justified in victimizing others with similar atrocities or upping the destructive ante.

According to the Terrorist Research Center, terrorists fall into one or more of the following categories of motivation: rational, psychological and cultural.

Rational terrorists make a cost-benefit analysis. They think through their goals and options, and seek to determine whether there are less costly and more effective ways to achieve their objective than by terrorism.

They assess the risk by weighing the target's defensive capabilities against their own abilities to attack. The crucial question they ask is whether terrorism will work for their desired purpose, given societal conditions at the time.

They also debate whether terrorism will induce enough anxiety to attain its goals without causing a backlash that will destroy the cause and perhaps themselves.

Terrorism that is psychologically motivated is derived from personal dissatisfaction with life and accomplishments.

These terrorists are egocentric in their views. They tend to feel they are right, and opposing views are wrong. They often project a "we versus they" attitude, and attribute evil motives to anyone outside their own group. This allows them to dehumanize their victims

QSA president recalls coming out

BY EDIE HALL
Kansas State Collegian

Ryan Gove, a graduate student in college student personnel, didn't come out about his homosexuality until he was a senior in college at the University of Connecticut.

"I first admitted to myself that I was gay when I was 21," Gove said. "I think that I just realized that I wasn't really attracted to women. I guess I had known for a while, but just didn't want to admit it. When I came out, it was because I finally realized that I just needed to be myself and not worry about what others thought. I just wanted to be happy."

Gove said both his friends and family reacted well to his announcement about being gay.

"I told my friends all individually and they really didn't care," Gove said. "Some had suspected, others hadn't but they were just happy that I was happy."

Gove said he told his family just last Christmas, and they also reacted to it very well.

"They had questions, but they were just glad that I was honest with them and glad I was happy," Gove said. "My friends all over the country and my family have been really supportive. It's not like they are like 'Hey, we are so glad you're gay', but they are just glad I'm happy and comfortable being me."

Now the president of the Queer Straight Alliance, or QSA, Gove has the chance to help other homosexual students who are struggling with the coming out process.

"QSA has allowed me the opportunity to meet other GLBT (gay, lesbian, bisexual, and transgendered) individuals here at K-State, but has also allowed me the opportunity to help individuals who are confused about their sexual orientation or struggling with the coming out process," Gove said. "I joined QSA last year when I first got here because I knew how important it was to have a strong group on campus."

"I had come from an institution in Missouri where the GLB group was nonexistent when I arrived, but thriving when I left and saw the impact it had on the campus educationally and on individuals as well."

Gove said he thinks the biggest problems facing the gay population at K-State are a lack of education and open-mindedness.

"A large problem is that a lot of people in general come to college questioning their sexual orientation, but the middle of Kansas is not thought of as the most open-minded and accepting place," Gove said. "I think people have a lot of misconceptions about the GLB community in general. I encourage people to become more educated and open minded rather than believe the media and stereotypes and stay close-minded."

Despite the stereotype of Kansas being closed-minded, Gove said he has generally been pretty well accepted.

"Luckily, I have been in places that have been pretty accepting," Gove said. "I think you will find that at most large state institutions in the Midwest people pretty much leave issues like sexual orientation alone. I'm treated fine at K-State."

Gove said he thinks National Coming Out week is a great time for the GLB community

Karen Mikola/Collegian
Ryan Gove, second year graduate student is the president of the Queer Straight Alliance. He is pursuing his masters degree in college student personnel.

and the K-State campus.

"It is a time when we can do things to educate the campus about the GLB community and give people the chance to break free from those stereotypes and learn for themselves," Gove said. "For the GLB community itself, it is a great time for us to come together and celebrate who we are within the larger community of K-State and even Manhattan."

Community educating itself about Middle East

BY SARAH BAHARI
Kansas State Collegian

When terrorists attacked the World Trade Center and the Pentagon, people were without answers.

But in the days following the attacks, people began searching for those answers. They turned to books, the Internet and the news to learn more about Middle Eastern affairs.

Some universities, including the University of Kansas, scrambled to begin new classes on the Middle East midway through the semester.

K-State will offer Middle Eastern politics in the spring, which it offers every other year.

Andrea Cardona, freshman in interior design, said she has brushed up on the Middle East in the last month.

"If the U.S. is involved in the situation over there, everyone should know what's happening to have an opinion and be a citizen," she said.

Cardona said she knew little about the region before the attacks, but local newspapers now have kept her up to speed.

Local bookstores even had to restock their shelves.

Melissa Theel, manager of Waldenbooks at Manhattan Town Center, said people have asked for books about Afghanistan and the Islamic religion.

"We just thirst for knowledge," Theel said. "A lot of us want to make informed decisions. I don't think we take things at face value anymore."

In many cases, Theel said, publishers have had to reprint editions. After the author of "Islam Today" appeared on Oprah several days ago, there was a huge demand for his book. The company rushed to reprint, and bookstores are now waiting for shipments — Waldenbooks being one of them, Theel said.

The book department manager at Hasting's said they have experienced the same thing.

Customers have asked for the "Dummy's Guide to the Middle East" and copies of the Quran, the Islamic bible. Books on Nostradamus and general Middle Eastern history books have also been in demand.

Theel said people often want more information during important times in history. For example, when former presidents die, people begin reading more about their lives and terms, she said.

But still, many students, like Brian Novak, senior in chemical engineering, say they know little about this region of the world.

"Not really anything," he said. "Just what I've picked up from the news, but I turned it off after the first couple of days because it got boring."

Beach Museum party set to honor 5th anniversary

The Marianna Kistler Beach Museum of Art will celebrate its fifth anniversary at a party with music, food and games.

The Student Friends of the Beach Museum of Art will be hosting the party from 5 to 8 p.m. Sunday at the museum.

The evening will include activities such as sidewalk chalk competitions, a scavenger hunt for prizes and a live band. Muzizi, a Jamaican Reggae Band, will play from 6:30 to 7:30 p.m.

Free food also will be provided by Country Kitchen as well as other sponsors.

Lindsey Curtis, president of the Student Friends, said the goal of the evening events are to get students to the museum so they can see what it offers.

"We just want the students to know that the museum exists for students as well as other groups," Curtis said. "They should take advantage of the museum being here."

STATE IN BRIEF

By The Associated Press

Sedgwick county unveils terrorism prevention plans

WICHITA — In the heart of tornado alley — where emergency preparedness for natural disasters is already a way of life — government officials are mobilizing to prepare residents for a terrorist attack.

On the 11th day of each month — in remembrance of the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks — government and citizens are being asked to practice for their own preparedness.

Thursday, Sedgwick County officials unveiled their "Ready to Respond" initiative — a combination of government, individual and community preparedness plans reminiscent of civil defense efforts during the Cold War.

County officials are urging Kansans to prepare home disaster kits with food, water, clothes, bedding and first-aid supplies.

They are scheduling a series of two-and-a-half-hour classes taught by emergency management personnel, firefighters and paramedics.

The classes will teach citizens how to create a home emergency plan, how to take shelter at their homes in the event of a hazardous chemical attack, how to prepare a home escape plan and what to take on an evacuation, among other things.

Cessna Aircraft strikes tentative deal with unions

WICHITA — Cessna Aircraft and union negotiators reached a tentative contract agreement Thursday that will give workers a raise of $11,000 over three years.

The International Association of Machinists and Aerospace Workers, Local Lodge 774, is recommending its members accept the proposal in a letter posted on its Web site.

Union members will vote Saturday on whether to accept the package, valued at $72 million over nearly three years. The current labor contract, covering 6,100 workers, expires at 12:01 a.m. Saturday.

NATION IN BRIEF

By The Associated Press

Bin Laden's chief deputy visited U.S. twice in 1990s

NEW YORK — Osama bin Laden's chief deputy visited the United States at least twice in the last decade to raise money for terrorism, according to federal court records.

Ayman al-Zawahiri made the trips in the early 1990s to help raise funds for the Egyptian Islamic Jihad, Ali Mohamed said Oct. 20, 2000, as he pleaded guilty to conspiracy charges stemming from the deadly bombings of two U.S. embassies in Africa.

"I helped him to do this," Mohamed told Judge Leonard B. Sand.

The sworn statement was highlighted in a San Francisco Chronicle story Thursday detailing how two members of a Silicon Valley terrorist cell admitted bringing al-Zawahiri to the United States to raise money for terrorism.

The newspaper said he traveled with a stolen passport supplied by the two men and used a fake name. It said he visited mosques in Santa Clara, Stockton and Sacramento during a nationwide fund-raising mission.

The Chronicle said he might have raised as much as $500,000 in the United States, mostly donations from U.S. Muslims who were told the money would support refugees of the Afghanistan war with the Soviet Union in the 1980s.

FBI warns of additional terrorist attacks on U.S.

WASHINGTON, D.C. — In a stark warning, the FBI said Thursday it has received information there might be additional terrorist attacks inside the United States or abroad in the next several days.

The bureau said its information does not identify specific targets, but it has asked local police to be on the highest alert and for all Americans to be wary of suspicious activity.

"The FBI has again alerted all local law enforcement to be on the highest alert and we call on all people to immediately notify the FBI and local law enforcement of any unusual or suspicious activity," the FBI said in its warning.

ASK THE FINANCIAL PLANNERS

The last thing my dad said when he went back home after helping me move into my apartment was to "pay that darn credit card bill." Most of my friends pay the minimum monthly payment. Dad thinks I should pay more than the minimum. What do you recommend?

Dear Student,

Your dad is correct. Paying the minimum monthly payment on your credit card only prolongs the number of payments you will actually have to make.

Let's say that you are paying 18 percent interest, which is about the national average and you only make the minimum monthly payment. It would take you 12 years and four months to pay off a $1,000 balance.

Worse still, this assumes you never make another purchase. Here's another way to look at it. The $1,000 in purchases that you make today actually end up costing you $2,353 if you only make the minimum monthly payment.

So, our recommendation is an easy one. Pay more than the minimum monthly payment on your credit card.

In Style

Students show personality through individual tastes

BY KECIA N. SEYB
Kansas State Collegian

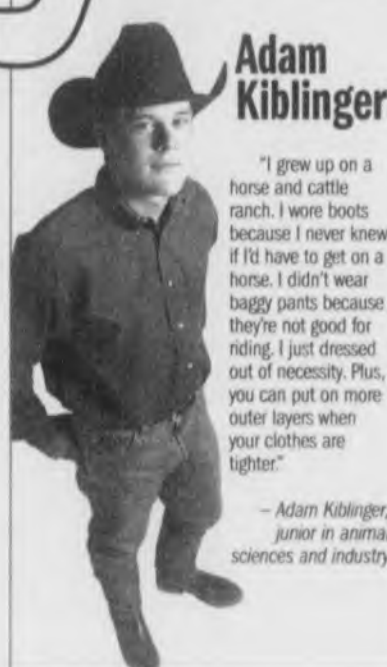

A 7-inch high mohawk split into five sections isn't quite the normal style for Manhattan residents. Dean Behrens, freshman in open-option, styled his hair this way using Elmer's glue and a blow dryer for a year. Behrens — along with some other students — has a noticeable difference in his style from the typical Manhattan person. He said his typical thrift store clothes, consisting of a lot of polyester, small T-shirts and his Saucony's or Chuck Taylor's don't get as many strange looks as his hair did. "It's easier for people to look past your clothes, but not so easy when your hair's sticking up 7 inches," he said. Behrens said he never feels uncomfortable sporting his own style in this small town. Actually, he said he gets looks from others at his home in the Kansas City area, too. "People here like it," he said. "I'm comfortable with it all the time no matter where I'm at." Adam Kiblinger, junior in animal sciences and industry, said he has been dressing in his button-down shirts, starched jeans, ball cap and either his Justin Chukkas or his cowboy boots all his life, so he always feels comfortable in his gear. "Because I never leave the ag department, I don't feel uncomfortable here," he said. "I think everyone's pretty much acclimated to the way I dress." "I just don't feel like dressing like a slob."

Another student, Tasha Brewer, junior in interior architecture, said she has been dressing in her type of threads — bootcut jeans, a fitted top, a lot of denim, natural colors — pretty much all her life. She said people might look at her in Manhattan, which she calls conservative, because of her clothes, but they do for good reasons. "They don't look at me weird," she said. "I get a lot of compliments, like, 'that's cool, that's different.'"

See STYLE on PAGE 10

"I guess you'd call my style urban, urbanistic — just carefree, fun. I just want to be different. I think different is good. You can still dress sexy, but still be classy."

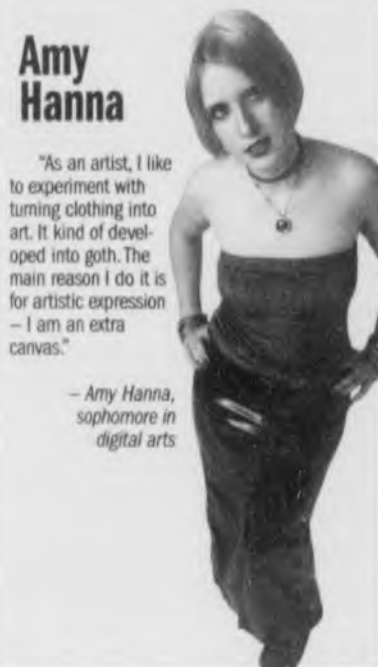

— Tasha Brewer, junior in interior architecture

Adam Kiblinger

"I grew up on a horse and cattle ranch. I wore boots because I never knew if I'd have to get on a horse. I didn't wear baggy pants because they're not good for riding. I just dressed out of necessity. Plus, you can put on more outer layers when your clothes are tighter."

— Adam Kiblinger, junior in animal sciences and industry

Amy Hanna

"As an artist, I like to experiment with turning clothing into art. It kind of developed into goth. The main reason I do it is for artistic expression — I am an extra canvas."

— Amy Hanna, sophomore in digital arts

Jaina Stutheit

"It's just the way I like to dress — not necessarily because I want to look like a hippy or anything. There's a stereotype that you do a lot of drugs and don't have a job and don't bathe. They're not true. Not all hippies have Volkswagen vans and are vegetarians."

— Jaina Stutheit, senior in print journalism

Dean Behrens

"I'd call myself a punk. It's just kind of not the same as everyone. I try to stand out — not only in my outer appearance, but the rest of me too. It's not like I separate myself from them — I just distinguish myself."

— Dean Behrens, freshman in open option

Campus should value different styles of dress

Style is a personal choice. Some people feel comfortable sporting mohawks or leather and others feel at home in a denim skirt.

Each day as we step out of our places of living and into the world, we present a physical image of ourselves. While certain trends might dominate the norm, it is important to appreciate those who step out of the norm.

It is admirable when someone has enough guts and is comfort with themselves to express their personal style.

Whether it is feeling comfortable in jeans and a T-shirt or boots and a cowboy hat, dress is a symbolic expression—a part of a person's personality they want the world to see.

While we all are more than the images we present, it is fun to look around campus at the diversity of dressing styles. Each style brings a color and vibrancy to campus. Our styles emphasize our individuality. So we encourage everyone to appreciate stylistic differences.

We should enjoy these last few years of not having to conform to corporate dress codes and express ourselves while we still can.

Bond for DUI — $5,500. Bond for aggravated burglary — $5,000. Three pairs of panties — $50. Being known for the rest of your college career as the guy who was arrested for stealing women's underwear — priceless.

Oh my gosh, I am missing three pairs of underwear! Someone call the cops.

Did anyone else get chased by the old men with green books yesterday?

I think we should ban the word "panties" from the English language. Do I have any backers?

You can't spell legal sanction without ATO.

My lawnmower also gets 38 miles to the gallon, but that doesn't make it cool.

In these trying times I only have one thing to say to my fellow man. Pee inside the toilet, not on it.

If K-State students really only drink zero to five drinks when they go out, then how come my roommate comes home with such ugly guys?

This is in regards to the poor little squirrels that are out here trying to find their acorns the people picked up. Those poor little squirrels are going to starve this winter because everyone picked up their acorns.

To all you Civic haters. The Del Sol is here.

I was just wondering why the ATO's had to go to the Pi Phi house to take women's underwear when they probably could have gone into their own drawers to get it.

Yeah, I forgot K-State's greek houses don't haze, they just tell their pledges what to do.

Is it a bird? Is it a plane? No, it is the snazzy trouser gang.

I thought getting laid was easy if you were a frat guy.

The best entertainment I have ever seen is my roommate lighting his farts on fire.

America, land of the free and home of the biggest hypocrites in the world. Is America everything it is cracked up to be?

Older and wiser

Research concludes higher drinking age effective, saves lives

As an 18-year-old arrested for a minor in possession of alcohol, I wished the drinking age was 18 instead of 21. I could have been saved from going through the legal process, explaining the situation to my parents, being put on diversion and shelling out cash for a lawyer and court expenses.

Now, a much wiser 22-year-old (well, older at least), I have realized the drinking age at 21 is the correct age. According to the American Medical Association homepage, in 1984, the federal government enacted the Uniform Drinking Age Act, which mandated reduced federal transportation funds to states that did not raise the minimum legal drinking age to 21.

Since then, it has been well-researched that people have been saved from injury and death all across America.

Perhaps, the most telling statistic is that the minimum legal drinking age of 21 has saved at least 1,000 lives of youth each year since 1984. This statistic proves a higher drinking age has been effective in greatly reducing alcohol-related deaths, injuries and accidents among youth.

A lower drinking age has shown an extremely high amount of alcohol-related problems, auto accidents, injuries and deaths among youth. Multiple studies have proven this correlation.

The issue at stake here is saving lives, and my supposed right as an 18-year-old to enjoy a frosty beverage pales in comparison to saving lives and people from injury.

Many who argue for a lower drinking age point to Canada and Europe because of the younger legal drinking ages they have.

However, what they fail to realize, is European youth must be older to drive, are less likely to have a car and have access to great public transportation systems. European countries are harsher with penalties handed down to drunk drivers, unlike the $500 fine and slap on the wrist given in most states in America.

In Canada, after the drinking age was lowered to 18 in the early 1970s, auto accidents among 18 to 20-year-olds skyrocketed. Harmful drinking among teenagers has become a concern for treatment agencies, and surveys show that 12 percent of Canadians were drinking regularly by age 15.

Everyone knows that underage drinking is very prevalent and most likely always will be. But just because many minors drink and sometimes purchase alcohol does not mean a drinking age of 21 is not effective.

Further research has shown that although minors still drink, they drink less and there is fewer deaths and accidents than when the drinking age was 18.

Australia also provides another great example for why the drinking age should be 21.

In the province of Queensland, there was a 92-percent rise in drunk driving among males age 17 to 20 after the drinking age was lowered to 18, while all over Australia there was a dramatic increase in non-traffic hospital admissions among youth, according to the Web site for the New Zealand Drug Foundation.

There is an important reason to keep the drinking age at 21. The bottom line is saving lives.

Inevitability of death gives new view of life

Death is a fact of life. We know it is inevitable. We know it's inescapable.

Yet, we seem to fear it more than anything.

Right now, I'm dealing with death. My grandma is very ill. By the time this column runs, I don't know if she'll still be alive.

Tuesday morning my boyfriend and I raced to get to Arkansas before my Grandma died. I was afraid. I didn't want to miss the chance to tell her I loved her one more time and to tell her I never would forget her.

I had a lot of time to think during the seven-hour drive to see my grandma. On the way I had a few realizations.

Death is not something we should fear. It's part of the natural process of living. It is more than just an end of life.

It can be a release. It is an end to the pain and suffering for those it takes. It's a comfort to the families who no longer have to see their loved ones suffer.

Death can be a wake-up call. Sometimes we take our lives for granted.

We think we're young and invincible and nothing will ever happen to us.

Life would not be so precious to us if we knew it would go on forever. Death reminds us to value every day, every hour, every moment we are given. We learn to appreciate life through death.

Death can be a healer. It can bring friends and families closer together. Families come together to comfort one another in their time of need.

Petty disputes are resolved or forgiven once we realize how much our family members and friends mean to us. Life is too short to fight over trivial issues. We are reminded to cherish those people who are so dear to us, no matter what wrongs they might have committed.

Death can reaffirm our faith.

Sometimes it's easy to lose sight of God in the hustle and bustle of our busy lives.

When we are surrounded by death, we are reminded of his power and his saving grace. Death reaffirms that God is the creator and also the taker of life.

Death can teach us so much if we are willing to listen. Dying is not something to fear. It's a natural part of life.

Sometimes death comes unexpectedly, other times it's a welcome release. I know we've all heard the cliché a thousand times that life is short. For some, that might be true. It doesn't matter how long you have lived. All that matters is how you lived your life.

If you chase your dreams, try to make right the wrongs and strive to be the best person you can be, then you know you have lived a full life. A good life isn't measured by many years, but rather by how much you really lived during those years.

The ultimate lesson death has to teach is about life itself. We shouldn't take our lives or those of our loved ones for granted.

Cherish every moment. Remind those near to you how much you love them. Rejoice in every minute God has given you. Take risks, and you will have no regrets when its time to leave this earth. Live every day to it's fullest.

Football team needs support regardless of on-field play

Editor,

I read through the forum on Tuesday and was appalled at the number of fair-weather fans who called in to complain about the game. Have we become so spoiled by victories that we don't know how to handle a loss or two?

It's sad we have so quickly forgotten what it was like before our numerous winning seasons. I remember, and it was not the best that K-State football has been.

Through all that, I still proudly wore my purple. Now we have a coach, who has brought a great deal of respect to our university.

ESPN comes to our stadium with GameDay coverage, we are nationally ranked and people in the football world expect us to be a powerhouse every year.

The Wildcats have lived up to this expectation year after year. Yet, we lose TWO games and suddenly our team can't play ball? I think not! These guys are out there every day working hard to earn the respect of their opponents, those that criticize them, and yes, even their fans.

Although the respect from the fans shouldn't have to be earned. It should be given without question.

Maybe our team will win the rest of this season's games, or maybe we'll see a losing season. Either way, we as a student body should support our team.

Now, more than ever, we need to let these guys know we have not lost faith in them. Next time you see a football player, let him know you support them and are still behind them.

I, for one, will proudly wear my purple this Saturday and still support my Wildcats, win or lose.

Talk show host commentary not meant to offend forces

Editor,

Bill Maher, host of ABC's late-night talk show "Politically Incorrect," got himself into hot water recently for comments he made regarding the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks.

On his Sept. 17 episode, Maher said, "We have been the cowards lobbying cruise missiles from 2,000 miles away. That's cowardly. Staying in the airplane when it hits the building, say what you want about it, it's not cowardly."

ABC's corporate offices immediately were flooded with angry calls, and two of the show's major advertisers (Sears and FedEx) promptly dropped their sponsorship. For several days following the airing of the show, the network even went so far as to pull the show from key East Coast markets.

Maher clearly meant nothing against our armed forces. As he went on to explain on later episodes, he meant politicians were cowardly by not taking a more aggressive approach to stopping Osama bin Laden in the six or more years we've been chasing him. No one, including Maher, would ever make the nonsensical assertion that our armed forces are too cowardly to fight—we all know better.

Perhaps six days after the attacks was too soon for Maher to make his remarks, but let's face it: what he said was true.

In 1998, when bin Laden's thugs carried out simultaneous bombings of U.S. embassies in Kenya and Tanzania, killing more than 200, President Clinton responded by sending 70 cruise missiles to destroy known al-Qaeda training camps in Afghanistan.

The cruise missiles failed to kill bin Laden, and it now appears they only served to piss him off.

Indeed, if Clinton had responded more aggressively in '98, perhaps the Sept. 11 attacks on America never would have happened. Rest assured, when Clinton's national security team briefed him about the embassy bombings and laid out his response alternatives before him, there was at least one person in the room who advocated a much stronger response than Clinton approved.

We should not view Clinton as responsible for the recent atrocities in America.

Bill Maher isn't on a campaign to blame Clinton for the attacks—he merely was pointing out the obvious. His show is sort of an informal, sometimes satirical think tank where guests are expected to brainstorm and kick around ideas about complex problems. We shouldn't persecute them for doing what the show's title proclaims.

Potluck planned for students

Two K-State organizations are providing an event to embrace diversity and welcome international students.

The International Coordinating Council and Study Abroad Club are

Saturday at Anneberg Park.

"It's hard for an international student to go up to an American and start a conversation," said Study Abroad Club president Joe Bryson.

Bryson said he spoke with an international student who told him that he came to the United States to learn about American culture.

Instead, all he does is hang out with those of his same nationality because he doesn't feel as though he can walk up to an American and make friends.

Bryson said he hopes many American students come to the picnic to promote friendships and help international students learn about American culture.

One way they're promoting different cultures is by asking people to bring ethnic dishes, including American.

"Food is a big part of culture. We want diverse food and diverse people," said Amanda Mendoza, Study Abroad Club vice president.

Mendoza said they would like to extend a welcoming hand to international students.

"We tend to put off people who are different than us and don't include them," Mendoza said.

The organizations had planned on having the event before the terrorist attacks, but the attacks reinforced the idea.

"Since it did happen, it was a driving force," Mendoza said.

Senate discusses memorial trees

BY ALYSON RALETZ
Kansas State Collegian

Student Body President Kyle Barker showed the Student Senators a diagram of where the New York memorial trees will be located in the K-State Student Union Plaza at Thursday's Student Senate meeting.

He said the five thornless hackberries representing the four World Trade Center towers and an additional one for the tragedy victims will be in front of Seaton Hall.

"Right now, administrators are talking about the plaques that will be placed near the trees," Barker said. "They are thinking carefully about what should be said so future generations can see the tragic effects of the disaster."

Additionally, senators allocated $145 to the India Student Association to fund a Zudiau folk dance Saturday at the International Student Center. John O'Hara, allocations committee chair, said the organization anticipates 400 people to attend the dance.

Also, they allocated $3,105 to the K-State Water Ski Team to send 15 members to its national championships. This is the first time the team has ever qualified.

"It may seem like this is a lot of money, but it really is not," O'Hara said.

"They will represent us well and hopefully bring home a trophy in the next few days."

In other action, senators approved university committee and Honor Council appointments at its meeting Thursday night.

Matt Wolters, Senate chair, said next week's meeting will be canceled because of the small amount of business to discuss.

BACKS TO THE WALL

Sophomore quarterback Eli Roberson is brought down in last weekend's game against Colorado. K-State will look to bounce back from two straight losses this weekend in Lubbock, Texas against the Texas Tech Raiders. The Cats haven't lost three straight games since 1992.

Cats look for first conference win against Texas Tech on Saturday

BY SEAN PURCELL
Kansas State Collegian

As questions continue to circle around K-State's recent two-game losing streak, players and coaches feel this weekend is an opportunity to show the team's determination.

"It's a frustrating time for us, but this is where we get to show our character and show the type of team that we really are," quarterback Marc Dunn said.

"Unfortunately, not every week is going to be a victory, and as a team you have to learn to deal with everything, and that is when you find out what kind of character a team really has."

For Coach Bill Snyder, that starts with looking to the team's nucleus for a bit more.

"I would like to think we have good capable leadership on this team," he said. "The test is here and I look for the right people to step up and be a prominent force in directing this football team."

One force Snyder will be utilizing to lead the Cats will be senior wideout Aaron Lockett.

"It's always frustrating when things don't go the way," he said. "I am confident that this team still has the ability to make things happen."

Even though there is some concern around the locker room, senior linebacker Ben Leber said he has faith in the team.

"We are pretty concerned right now, but we have a right to be because we have never faced a situation like this," he said. "I know that the character of this team and I know we can pull through this."

Leber said although the team might be at a low point, it is an opportunity to learn and improve. The process began with a good mentality in practice, he said.

"The positive attitude is there," he said.

"This week will show how we will do this weekend."

With the recent losses, Dunn said this weekend will decide whether the team can bounce back and recover.

"This is a cross-roads for our team," he said. "You learn a lot from a loss, and how you respond tells you a lot about a team."

K-State will have to contain a Tech offense that revolves around quarterback Kliff Kingsbury, a player that Snyder said he is impressed with.

"He is an improved player, which goes with being in the system another year," he said. "This is an extremely tough youngster that doesn't make a lot of mistakes in his wide-receiver selection and decision making."

Another facet of Tech's game is its ability to use senior running back Ricky Williams as an option for both its running and passing attacks.

Williams has averaged only 80 yards on the ground, but he also is the team's leading receiver in catches.

"I think Texas Tech has an appropriate mix for what their systems allow," Snyder said. "They have used a talented player in Ricky Williams to do that."

One weakness for the Red Raiders this season has been their inability to stop the running game. However, Snyder said it is important for K-State to achieve running success no matter the opponent.

"Regardless of what Texas Tech has or has not done against the running game, it is important for us to not only establish our own running game, but to establish a balance in our offense as well," he said.

Leber said a positive response to the Cats' early setbacks this year could become an interesting part of how this season's story is told.

"How we guide and lead this team will probably go down in the history of Kansas State," he said. "There is a lot of season left. We can't get down on ourselves. We just have to keep a positive attitude."

Game 5: Texas Tech

Date & Time: 7 p.m., Saturday
Series: Tied, 3-3
Facts: K-State's game against Texas Tech is the Wildcats' first night game of the year. It is also the first game of the year not televised. The Cats have gone winless since earning the school's 400th win against New Mexico State earlier this year. K-State last lost three straight games in 1992.

Raiders' passing poses threat

BY DEREK BOSS
Kansas State Collegian

The Big 12's top-ranked passing offense might be without its No. 1 quarterback this weekend.

Texas Tech's Kliff Kingsbury, who's averaged 288 yards per game through the air in 2001, is questionable for Saturday's contest with K-State.

In last week's double-overtime loss to Kansas, Kingsbury exited late in the third quarter with a sprained thumb on his right throwing hand, and his status has been listed as day-to-day by Texas Tech's Sports Information.

However, the University Daily in Lubbock, Texas, reported that Kingsbury said he will, in fact, play against the Wildcats.

If not, it will be backup B.J. Symons under center. Symons completed just 2 of 9 passes in relief of Kingsbury last week but did score on a nine-yard scramble in the first overtime.

But neither fact affects K-State's preparation for Saturday strong safety Milton Proctor said.

"We heard he's injured, but we can't go through this week thinking Kingsbury's not going to be the quarterback," Proctor said. "So we're just going to continue to practice like he is, and be ready to take care of him."

That might not be such a simple task, as K-State learned last year.

The 6-foot-4 Kingsbury threw for 302 yards in the 28-23 loss, but his resiliency in the pocket is what impressed linebacker Ben Leber.

"I think we can learn a lot from what we did last year," Leber said. "We put pressure on him — we hit him a bunch of times — and I give him a lot of credit for staying in there. I think he took a lot of good shots. But we've just got to keep pressure on him, make him have quick decisions, and hopefully we can step in front of some balls."

Texas Tech's Kliff Kingsbury is flushed out of the pocket in last season's game at KSU Stadium. The Wildcats won the game, 28-23, despite allowing 302 yards through the air to Kingsbury and the Red Raiders.

Michael Young/Collegian

Kingsbury will be without two of his top targets from a year ago — wideouts Derek Dorris and Tim Baker — both lost to graduation.

Now, the junior's leading receiver lines up right behind him in the backfield. Tailback Ricky Williams has garnered 33 receptions this season, averaging 60.5 yards per contest.

Leber faces the challenge of containing Williams again this season, holding most coverage responsibilities out of the backfield at mike linebacker.

"It's very difficult," he said. "It tests all your mental and physical capacities. And it's not only just trying to get out to the flats to try and cover him, but you've got to make an open field tackle sometimes."

For the past two years, K-State has had the luxury of facing Oklahoma prior to the Tech contest. Defensive coordinator Phil Bennett said the Sooners and Red Raider offenses are quite similar schematically, and Tech's use of Williams as a receiver much resembles OU's Quentin Griffin.

K-State didn't have much trouble keeping Griffin under wraps two weeks ago, though, holding the tailback to just three receptions on the day.

But even if the Cats contain Williams, the Red Raiders offense remains potent — especially if Kingsbury's in the lineup, free safety Jon McGraw said. The senior said Kingsbury has a knack for getting the Tech offense clicking on all cylinders.

"I don't think it's one thing," McGraw said. "It's a conglomeration of things that he does."

"He's really the force behind that offense."

Tech game gains new meaning

NOTE: Please excuse the following column, as it touches on aspects of K-State football that are, frankly, unfamiliar and sensitive topics. It seems Wildcat fans still are waiting to wake up from this inconceivable dream.

Never in a million years would I see myself saying these words.

Not now. Not at such an inopportune time. Not about a K-State program that has made a remarkable, steady climb from the depths of college football to the brink of national championship contention in less than a decade.

Not with the Wildcats so close to preserving that precious national respect that they fought so hard to attain.

It's tough to think about — let alone say — but it's true:

K-State will play its biggest game of the season this weekend at Texas Tech.

Pretty scary, huh?

No matter whether the Red Raiders play us tough each year — as last season's 28-23 scare would attest — nobody highlights the K-State/Tech game on their calendar.

Give me a break.

Those marks are saved for the Nebraska's and Oklahoma's — games that over the past few seasons have pretty much determined who represents the Big 12 as conference champion.

But after back-to-back losses to OU and Colorado this season — I'm sorry to say — the Tech game is the most critical one of all.

If K-State falls in Lubbock, Texas, it will be the first time a Wildcat team has lost three straight since 1992. And let me remind you, that was the last year K-State failed to qualify for a bowl game.

We'll hope history doesn't repeat itself.

But seriously, as if the Cats don't already have their backs against the wall — scraping the cellar of the Big 12 conference standings — any kind of falter this weekend will just continue that downward spiral.

K-State needs a win this weekend — and a convincing one at that. One that regains confidence.

Thom Jackson was faced with a dilemma when he learned that flutist Mimi Stillman couldn't keep her scheduled performance at McCain Auditorium for this evening.

"We had two options: cancel it or replace the booking with equal talent," said Jackson, marketing and development officer for McCain.

He decided the show must go on. In Stillman's place will be flutist Christina Jennings, accompanied by concert pianist Rodney Waters. Jennings will perform at 8 tonight in McCain.

Richard Martin, director of McCain, said he thinks booking Jennings was the right move.

"She comes very highly recommended by the management through whom we had booked Ms. Stillman," Martin said.

Jackson said he is excited about the show.

"She has a mature sound," he said.

Jennings has the honor of being the first flutist in 15 years to win the Concert Artists Guild International Competition, which she won at its 50th anniversary this year. In addition, she also has taken home first prize at the Houston Symphony Ima Hogg Competition and has played with groups such as the Pro Arte Symphony of Cambridge, England and the Canton Symphony.

"She's performed with a wide range of orchestras and under a number of important conductors," Martin said.

In addition to her concert tonight, Jennings also is participating in residency activities and workshops with area schools, as well as K-State music classes. Martin said he thinks such activities are beneficial to those who attend.

"We think it's important to reach out to school-aged children because often, they're not going to be brought to campus to experience this," he said.

Jackson said Stillman chose to not keep her performance because of concerns about the effects the events of Sept. 11 have had on air travel and that many people have understood her situation.

"It's been viewed with empathy," Jackson said. "People have understood Ms. Stillman's concerns about travel right now."

While he said he is disappointed that Stillman will not be able to perform, he is anticipating an enjoyable show tonight.

"The two performers both have experience, but Ms. Jennings has been out there with more professional experience, a great deal more so than Ms. Stillman," Jackson said.

Jennings' program for the evening includes Gluck's Dance of the Blessed Spirits and Prokofiev Sonata for Flute and Piano, Opus 94. An unusual aspect of the performance, Martin said, is that it has a title.

"Myths and Legends" is the title of the program," Martin said. "Each piece has to do with a figure out of myth or legend."

"This is interesting because the concert isn't usually assigned a name. Sometimes they're chosen for an emotional reason. One part of the concert might be heavy in intellectual content, whereas the second part might be light."

Tickets

Christina Jennings will perform at 8 tonight in McCain Auditorium. Tickets are $6 for students and $12 for general public between the ages of 18 and 65 and are available at the McCain box office, 532-6428.

Step teams, Silk to perform at Neak Frasty

BY BECKY FISCHER
Kansas State Collegian

Neak Frasty is back for its 11th year at K-State.

The traditional show will be at 7 p.m. Saturday in McCain Auditorium and will feature recording artist Silk as well as representatives of black fraternities and sororities from around the Midwest. The representatives perform onstage to express a message, said Paris Rossiter, junior in digital art and coordinator for this year's show.

"Neak Frasty is a form of cultural expression," he said. "It's born of the black greek system and serves as an opportunity to show other people what your fraternity or sorority is about through rhythm."

The representatives communicate their message in different ways, Rossiter said.

"Step teams can consist of two to 12 or 13 people," he said. "The size might depend on the message the group is trying to put out there. And the messages are usually different because the aims of different fraternities and sororities are different."

The representative groups are called step teams because a big part of what they do involves different dance steps, Rossiter said.

"It's sort of like a cheer routine," Rossiter said. "There's a lot of movement

Courtesy photo

Silk will perform at 7 p.m. Saturday in McCain Auditorium.

and energy going on. Dancing, stepping, chanting, even some skits are all a part of the show."

Silk will perform for an hour after the step show, Rossiter said he enjoys the group's music.

"They've been around since '92, and they've been consistently one of my favorite acts," Rossiter said. "They write love songs. It's music to get your groove on."

One thousand dollars in cash will be given to the best step team.

"It's an added incentive," Rossiter said. "Teams have to make sure their step is as electrifying, exciting and precise as possible. Then they might win the money and the gloating rights."

Neak Frasty has interested Rossiter since he first came to K-State he said, and he's wanted to be involved with it ever since.

"Coordinating this event is sort of a culmination of my years at Alpha Phi Alpha," he said. "I want to prove something to myself and to the campus, and I feel like I've done a good job so far. You know, when you have a large venue that can pull in 1,600 to 2,000 people, there's a lot of people saying you can't do it. To be able to do it is a great feeling."

Fraternities and sororities will be coming in from four Midwest schools to perform on Saturday night, or just to support their team and watch the show, Rossiter said.

One of the attending schools is Central Missouri State University. Shivan Bullock, a senior in computer and information systems at CMSU, will be performing Saturday night to represent her sorority, Zeta Phi Beta.

"This is the first year we've traveled to another school to step," Bullock said. "We've worked hard, and we're prepared. I'm excited to see the crowd's response, and hopefully, we'll win the money."

Bullock said her step team is small, but she expects the crowd to be impressed by its talent rather than its size.

"We're only three girls," she said, "but we've got some difficult moves. We step hard."

Erica Smith, junior in apparel and textile marketing, said she's attended Neak Frasty ever since she came to K-State.

"It's a great event," Smith said. "I've attended for the past three years because I always have a good time."

The good time is shared by a group of people from all over, which is what Smith said she anticipates.

"A whole bunch of people show up, and it's one big fun gathering," she said. "You get to meet a lot of new people and see everyone in their gear."

"It is conservative — that's what I thought when I first got here. When I went to the Town Center, I was dyin', I was sufferin'."

She said she shops for bargains, though, and she values comfort and classiness.

"I try not to be too flashy and try not to overdo it," Brewer said. "You can still dress sexy but still be classy — leave enough to the imagination and not show all your goods."

All three students in addition to Jaina Stutheit, senior in print journalism, and Amy Hanna, sophomore in digital arts, said the way they dress reflects their personalities.

"It's just kind of laid-back, open-minded, kind of don't care what other people think of what I wear," Stutheit said.

"A lot of times I just get looks. I remember one time I was wearing a faded tie-dye shirt and jeans with a whole in them. Some guy drove by and yelled, 'get a job, and you can buy yourself some new clothes, bitch.'"

These students said they didn't think Manhattan is too judgmental. Behrens, who has now cut his 7-inch mohawk, said he enjoyed his past-year hair style for a couple of reasons.

"I definitely like attention. Also, it's just a fun hair style," he said. "I can't be just regular."

One that rejuvenates team morale. One that seems to salvage a whole season in just 60 minutes.

Now, I'm not saying I didn't expect an off-season sometime in the Snyder era (and by off-season, I mean three or four losses), and I'm not saying that a less-than-stellar year in 2001 will cause the program to revert back to mediocrity.

Just now isn't the team for it. I would love to be in the Cat locker room this weekend prior to kickoff. I just wonder what kind of things Snyder will tell his troops to put their minds in perspective.

Let's hope it's good — because if there's any time for legendary Bear Bryant-like speeches, it's now for Snyder and K-State. It's now or never.

TERRORISM

and remove any sense of ambiguity from their minds.

The result is a clarity of purpose, and it appeals to those who crave violence to relieve their anger.

Psychologically motivated terrorists also desire a sense of belonging, which is fulfilled by the terrorist group. With some terrorists, this acceptance is a stronger motivator than the goals of the organization.

These people tend to demand unanimity and do not tolerant dissent.

And finally, they can be culturally motivated.

These terrorists, according to the research center, turn to violence when they anticipate a threat to ethnic group survival, or if they fear cultural extermination by "outsiders."

The idea of losing a language, religion, group membership, homeland or native territory can trigger defensive reactions.

Threats to religion, however, might invoke the greatest response. This is because not only does it put the cultural terrorists' present at risk, but also their cultural past and future.

Therefore, terrorism in the name of religion can be especially violent.

"What would otherwise be extraordinary acts of desperation become a religious duty in the mind of the religiously motivated terrorist," the Terrorism Research Center stated.

Family Day provides look at KSU

BY OLENA NIKOLAYENKO
Kansas State Collegian

Wearing a purple T-shirt, Christopher Lydick, freshman in computer engineering, greeted his parents, his grandmother and his three sisters on campus. Like many other students on Family Day, he took on the responsibility and pride in showing K-State to his family members.

"I am proud to be at K-State, so I wanted to share it with my family," Lydick said.

For a day, Lydick turned into a tour guide, showing Manhattan landmarks and the university buildings to the visitors from his home turf — Ottawa, Kan.

"I am going to show them around Manhattan and campus to get them the kind of experience I have here," Lydick said.

They made the first stop at the K-State

Student Union — normally a quiet place on Saturday morning, but full of life that weekend. There was a wide range of children's games, in which adults also participated.

The Army Reserve placed an inflatable obstacle course on the Union Plaza, which took, on average, 15 seconds to go through all the walls and tunnels, testing the participant's strength and flexibility, cadet Brianna Thero, senior in criminology, said.

"All ages have done it, but little kids are most active," Thero said. "Children are less reserved in making a fool of themselves in front of others."

Many visitors lined up in front of the face-painting table patiently waiting for their turn and casting an appraising look around. Lydick's 7-year-old sister, Theresa, showed a smile upon her painted face.

The many changes on campus did not escape the eye of Mark Metzler, a K-State alumnus, who came to visit his daughter, Melanie, sophomore in nutrition and exercise science.

"There are more buildings and a better football team," Metzler said.

One of the reasons Melanie said she wanted her parents to come to K-State was to meet her friends' families because they would be there, too.

Residence halls and greek houses were a popular point of destination for many families.

"About 40 percent of parents came on Family Day," said Pristine Alexander, sophomore in preoccupational therapy and community assistant for Moore Hall.

Sitting at the front desk, Alexander could

Bush rejects offer for negotiations

BY GENARO C. ARMAS
The Associated Press

WASHINGTON, D.C. — President Bush sternly rejected a Taliban offer to discuss handing over Osama bin Laden to a third country as U.S. jets began a second week of bombing. "They must have not heard. There's no negotiations," the president said Sunday.

The number of people exposed to anthrax grew to 12 with the addition of a police officer and two lab technicians in New York. Health and Human Services Secretary Tommy Thompson declared that attempts to transmit the deadly bacteria through the mail is an act of terrorism.

However, officials said they still do not have evidence linking the anthrax outbreaks in Florida and New York to terrorists.

"We should consider this potential that it is linked," Attorney General John Ashcroft said on NBC's "Meet the Press." "It is premature at this time to decide whether there is a direct link."

National security adviser Condoleezza Rice sought to quell fears that the terrorists might have crude nuclear weapons. A defense official said last week that if the terrorists have obtained any nuclear material, they might be able to make a weapon that could spread radiation without an actual destructive explosion. "We have no credible evidence at this point of a specific threat of that kind," Rice said on CBS's "60 Minutes."

Bush Cabinet members mobilized at home and abroad Sunday.

Ashcroft said investigators are looking to question about 190 people who might have knowledge of terrorism. Secretary of State Colin Powell left for a high-priority diplomatic mission to Pakistan and India aimed at keeping tensions between those nations from further complicating the military campaign in neighboring Afghanistan.

Returning to the White House after a weekend at the Camp David retreat, Bush reiterated four clear conditions the Taliban must meet before bombing will be stopped.

Bush said all they have to do is turn over bin Laden, his colleagues, destroy his camps and release the innocent people being detained in Afghanistan.

The latter was an apparent reference to eight foreign aid workers imprisoned in Afghanistan. The administration had avoided calling them hostages. In his speech to a joint session of Congress on Sept. 20, Bush said they had been unjustly imprisoned. A White House spokeswoman said she believed it was the first time Bush had publicly used the word "hostage."

Bush said there would be no negotiations even as a Taliban leader suggested the Afghan government would be willing to discuss surrendering bin Laden to a third country if the United States provided evidence of his guilt and stopped bombing.

"There's no need to discuss innocence or guilt," Bush said. "We know he's guilty."

Overseas, a U.S. military official said the bombing of Afghanistan has entered a cleanup mode.

U.S. warplanes have destroyed nearly all of the targets originally assigned to them, including militant training camps and weapons storage areas, the captain of the USS Enterprise aircraft carrier said Sunday.

The new strikes destroyed Kabul's international telephone exchange, severing one of the last means of communication with the outside world.

Bush ignored a reporter's question about whether he wants to install a new government if the Taliban falls. Rice sought to strike a delicate balance on the issue.

"America cannot choose the future government of Afghanistan. Only the Afghan people can choose the future government of Afghanistan," she said. But, she said, "We have no reason to leave an Afghanistan that its neighbors have to fear for instability."

AMERICA RESPONDS

University ranked 31st in Yahoo technology poll

BY CORINNE BLENDER
Kansas State Collegian

The latest edition of Yahoo! Internet Life magazine ranked K-State as the 31st most wired college out of a pool of more than 1,300 universities and research centers.

"This means that K-State is ranked 31 in providing information technology enhanced administrative and academic services, enhanced information environments for teaching and learning, and also availability of information technology enhanced information access for students," said Beth Unger, vice provost for academic services and instruction.

K-State jumped up two spots from last year's ranking of 33 in the poll.

John Pickrell, faculty senate committee on technology chair and associate professor of diagnostic medicine pathobiology, said areas such as the Information Commons, consisting of approximately 100 computers that have been added to Hale Library and the K-State Student Union, are new links for students to access information such as scientific journals via the World Wide Web.

"K-State students have an excellent access to information technology generally for learning," Unger said. "This includes access to a course delivery system for about 400 of the courses at the university."

Other schools in the Big 12 that join K-State in the top 100 poll include: Iowa State at 20, the University of Colorado at 49, the University of Texas at 68, the University of Nebraska at 83, Texas A&M University at 89 and Baylor University at 91.

Pickrell said the faculty constantly is researching ways to improve K-State's information technology on campus. He also said students play an important role and contribute to the desire to wire K-State to the rest of the world.

"It would be our opinion that the increase in ratings comes from the level of use of information technology on campus for and by students and the innovative uses that are made at K-State," Unger said.

Party at the Beach

Weekend events mark museum's 5th anniversary

Chalked portraits of Van Gogh's "The Starry Night" and Botticelli's "The Birth of Venus" decorated the parking lot of the Marianna Kistler Beach Museum of Art on Sunday for its fifth-year anniversary party.

The event, sponsored by the Student Friends of the Beach Museum of Art, included a booth where partygoers could make their own hemp jewelry, sidewalk chalk, pumpkin bowling, a door-prize drawing and a scavenger hunt. The Reggae Band Muzizi played music at the event.

Katherine Schlageck, education and public services supervisor for the museum, said the museum had been celebrating its birthday for three days with three separate events.

"We had a black-tie event, an open house, and this," she said. "We've had about 600 to 700 people visit us for those, so we've had a real diverse crowd. It's pretty exciting."

Steam leak damages Hale Library's computers

BY CORBIN H. CRABLE
Kansas State Collegian

Weekend on-call workers from the Division of Facilities and members of the K-State Police worked Sunday night to control steam that spilled into Hale Library late Sunday afternoon.

The fire department and the campus police were called to the scene at 4:50 p.m. Sunday, shortly after the fire alarms sounded, and the building was evacuated. Workers from facilities also were on hand to investigate the cause of the steam leak, which was determined to be a break in a steamline. The heat and humidity from the steam caused the alarms to go off, said Officer Gary Marshall of the campus police.

Hale remained closed for the remainder of the day, Brice Hobrock, dean of libraries, said. He said the steam had seeped into some of the computers, damaging them, and that they will be down indefinitely. The steam had been controlled by 8 p.m. Sunday.

Hobrock said Hale would be open today, but simply functioning would be a struggle.

"We'll have a very hard time doing business, and students will have a hard time using our resources," he said.

Marshall said the police and facilities would continue to work today at the library to get the line fixed and everything else operational.

Phelps' church pays back property taxes on truck

TOPEKA — Westboro Baptist Church, where the Rev. Fred Phelps Sr. is pastor, has paid $1,594.76 in back property taxes on Phelps' 1995 pickup truck.

Shawnee County Treasurer Rita Cline said someone from the church paid the back taxes Friday. Cline had ordered her staff not to renew vehicle tags until the sum was paid.

The truck's tax exempt status has been stripped by the Kansas Board of Tax Appeal, and that decision was upheld by the Kansas Supreme Court when it denied review of the case in May 2000.

Yet, the church still claims the truck is an extension of its property and should be exempt from taxes. It hasn't had to pay the registration until now because the truck's tax status had been laboring in the courts.

A church statement said the church is preparing civil rights litigation against the governmental agencies and officials involved in the case.

Cline, a Republican candidate for governor, had said a tax warrant would be issued against the church if it did not pay by Tuesday.

Ford plant halts production after discovery of powder

CLAYCOMO, Mo. — An evening shift that normally would produce about 800 vehicles was canceled after an employee found a suspicious powder at Ford's Claycomo plant, a company official said.

Kansas City Fire Department hazardous materials officials determined that the powder found Saturday in a newspaper at the plant was non-toxic.

Because the substance was found in the paper, investigators were looking into the possibility that it was paper dust, a normal by-product of the newsprint manufacturing process.

The paper also has been sent to Jefferson City for testing, FBI spokesman Jeff Lanza said. "There's absolutely no indication that there's anything dangerous," Lanza said.

No one was injured, but several employees were decontaminated as a precaution.

Authorities did not evacuate the plant's 3,000 day shift employees, but they ordered the plant shut down for a few hours, plant human resources director Ed Thompson said.

The shutdown blocked delivery of parts needed for production, leading to cancellation of the plant's evening shift, Thompson said.

Production on the Escape, Mazda Tribute and F-150 trucks would continue Saturday night with the midnight shift, Thompson said.

NATION IN BRIEF

By The Associated Press

Mistake in programming causes U.S. to miss target

WASHINGTON, D.C. — The precision bombs and missiles with complex targeting technology only are as fail-safe as the humans who create and program them.

A guided bomb dropped on Afghanistan missed its target by a mile Saturday.

The Pentagon said a target coordinate was entered incorrectly into its satellite navigation system.

Ground reports indicated that four people were killed and eight injured, according to a Pentagon statement. U.S. officials said they had no way to confirm the number of casualties.

"The munitions that are being used tend to be very precise. They are not 100 percent," Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld said.

Giuliani: Victims of NBC anthrax attacks to recover

NEW YORK — Anthrax spores were found on the police officer and two lab technicians involved in detecting the case of anthrax at NBC, Mayor Rudolph Giuliani said Sunday.

The mayor said they were being treated with antibiotics and were expected to be fine. He said that exposure to the spores does not necessarily mean they have the anthrax infection.

"When they were tested, minuscule spores were found," Giuliani said at a news conference.

He said the police officer who retrieved the envelope was found to have anthrax in his nose, as did one lab technician investigating the case.

Another lab technician was found to have a spore on her face, Giuliani said. "They are being treated," he said.

"This does not mean they have anthrax."

The mayor also said the New York Police Department has received more than 100 calls from people concerned about exposure, and that hospital emergency rooms also have experienced numerous inquiries.

But he said: "None of them have proven to be anything else but negative."

Authorities rounding up escaped Texas inmates

DALLAS — The third of five inmates who escaped from a Texas jail was apprehended Saturday night, authorities said.

Brian Riley, 27, was arrested at a home in Fannin County, about 30 miles east of the jail, Grayson County Sheriff Keith Gary said. Two others were caught Friday night at a horse stable.

"There were some folks there who were harboring Riley, and they may face charges themselves," Gary said.

All five inmates had been jailed on various charges. The men jimmied the locks on their cell doors, crawled through the ventilation system and tunneled their way out through a dirt floor in the basement.

CAMPUS Post Card

Matt Farris

For Matt Farris, senior in architecture, the $1,000 scholarship came out of nowhere.

The College of Architecture, Planning and Design awarded Farris the John E. Holstrom Alpha Tau Omega Architectural Scholarship at the college's annual dinner in May. He said he had completely forgotten it even awarded the scholarship.

"It was a total surprise," he said. "It hadn't even crossed my mind."

The scholarship was given based on nominations. He said he had many of the qualifications the committee was looking for.

"The main characteristic they look for is being quite active in the college and department," he said.

He said he has served as an officer for the American Institute of Architecture Students, chair of the Dean Student Advisory Board, a member of the building facilities committee for Seaton Hall, and founded and led the college's New Student Mentor Program.

Farris said it often is difficult to balance all his activities. "Sometimes it means no sleep," he said. "It means a little compromise."

After graduation in May, he said he hopes to work for a firm in a marketing or management position.

English language program teaches life skills, provides sense of freedom

BY SARAH BAHARI
Kansas State Collegian

When Angelina Perez moved to the United States from Mexico seven years ago, she felt lost.

In an unfamiliar situation and surrounded by unfamiliar people, Perez couldn't make appointments, pay insurance, bank, go grocery shopping or visit the doctor.

She felt helpless. "It's like disabilities," said Perez, who is in her fourth year at the Adult Learning Center's English as a Second Language Program.

Perez used to get a ride to school because she didn't know how to drive. But after taking ESL classes, she eventually was able to take and pass the driver's test.

"You feel more free," she said.

Perez is one of about 60 students enrolled in the Adult Learning Center's ESL program, which is funded by local, state and federal grants. Tuition is free for students.

The classes, which are broken up into beginning, advanced and intermediate sections, teach students ages 18 and older how to speak, read and write English.

DuckAe Jeong, from Korea, reads during English as a second language classes at the Adult Learning Center. The classes provide an opportunity for people unfamiliar with the English language to gain a basic understanding of the language.

But the school does much more.

Earlier this week, some students learned about Christopher Columbus, while others learned how to read and decipher nutrition labels.

"We try to help them with life skills so they can manage better," ESL teacher Carol Vardeventer said. "Most of our students are just interested in being able to function on a daily basis."

The program also offers citizenship training and computer courses.

"We help them function in American culture and society," said Candie White, director of the center. But learning English as an adult is no easy task, as Russia native Olga Stolbov has learned.

Stolbov, who moved to the United States three years ago, was well-educated in her home country. At the university, she learned some English translating scientific journals from English to Russian and vice-versa.

But that was more than 20 years ago, and adjusting to a new culture while learning a new language can be frustrating, Stolbov said.

"It's really difficult to understand spoken English," she said. "I have good ears — it's not a health thing — but it's difficult."

Teachers often run into obstacles, too, White said. The program is not bilingual, so sometimes teachers and students have a hard time communicating.

"The communication barrier can be an issue," she said. "There are cultural differences we have to be aware of."

The students also come from all different countries, so they can have a hard time understanding each other, Vardeventer said.

Students come from different backgrounds. While some students were well-educated in their countries, theirs were illiterate, she said.

Blanca Szecsi, who has lived in the United States for 14 years, enrolled in ESL classes for several reasons.

"Because I want to learn English and help my daughter in middle school and look for a better job," Szecsi, who is from Mexico, said.

Sonia Arevald, who is from El Salvador, is in the same situation.

In her country, she worked as a secretary. But when she moved to the United States three years ago, she wasn't qualified to work as a secretary because she didn't know English well enough.

She said she hopes ESL classes will help her find a better job.

DuckAe Jeong, who moved from Korea 10 months ago, said the teachers at the school have made learning English much easier.

"It's hard but interesting. Teachers are very kind," she said.

"Everything is difficult because it is not my own language, though."

Learning a new language as an adult is difficult, but not impossible, Perez said.

"For a lot of people here, they think it is too late. It's easier when you are younger, but it's never too late," she said. "If you like to learn it, you can do it."

Success linked to advances in campus wiring

According to Yahoo!, our campus is the 31st most wired in the nation.

In the last year, the university has added several new spots on campus for students to access technology. From the implementation of the Information Commons in Hale Library to the new links at the K-State Student Union, now more than ever we have technology at our hands.

During the last few years, K-State also has updated several classrooms, making them more technology-friendly, offering computers, video screens and other tools. This technology provides teachers an interactive teaching atmosphere and can increase students' interest in learning.

We are thankful for the hard work that's been done to make K-State more wired. And as anyone who goes to the library knows, students are taking full advantage of this technology. While we are grateful, we also would like to urge the university to keep up its level of commitment of providing access to students. We believe it is vital for the university to stay on top of technological advancements that will assist in our learning.

The Collegian's Campus Fourum is an anonymous call-in system that allows readers to voice their opinions on topics relevant to the publication.

I would like to know when we are going to quit sending $300 million to New York City and start sending it to the starving children in Afghanistan.

Whenever I like a girl, I try to talk to her. If that doesn't work, I just drink myself silly.

I am informing the public — bows have officially been banned for being used in the hair.

Maybe the kickers should walk around campus kicking all of the fuzzy squirrels, practicing up for the game.

Our house mom is now scared because of you ATO's raiding panties.

Is it just me or is the word 'fourum' spelled wrong? I always thought it was forum.

Maybe if we start practicing against the Manhattan High Indians, we will get better. That is, if we can beat them.

Please, please, I beg of you all, quit using the word 'panties.' It is the most annoying word ever thought of.

OK, honestly, who else besides me lied on their credit card application to get the free T-shirt?

Why does everyone keep making fun of my Hanson shirt?

Am I the only one who has noticed the eerie similarity between the year 2001 and the book, "1984," or were we just too busy enjoying our two-minute hate whenever bin Laden appeared on our televisions?

Dennis Miller is drunk every Monday night.

Hey, Michael Noll, wasn't it you who said 'Put me into the game?' As if you could do any better. When you become starting quarterback is when K-State fans become terrible.

Why is it whenever there is something good on television, the president has to come in and ruin it?

Does it mean you are a big loser if you set your kitchen alarm for when 'South Park' is going to be on?

Making history

Generation X full of people with ambition, energy

I am part of Generation X, a group of people born between 1961 and 1981.

I'm supposed to be a selfish, cynical slacker and depend on my parents. I'm supposed to question authority and feel as though I carry the burden of the previous generations.

I don't buy into that description because it's not what I see.

I see more than 20,000 students — most of them Gen-X'ers — who work hard every day. Sometimes we might falter and forget to turn in an assignment, but that's not because we're slackers. It's because we're human.

I see students

who want to make a difference on campus through more than 350 campus organizations, 24 fraternities, 11 sororities and countless off-campus opportunities.

There's a lot of talk about our generation and our ability, or lack thereof, to handle a nation in crisis. In my opinion, we're educated and ready to roll with whatever's next.

Our nation has taken a sharp turn into uncertain territory, and Generation X isn't just along for the ride. We're out there learning about Afghanistan, our government and ourselves. True, we've never experienced this kind of national uncertainty before, but that doesn't mean we can't handle it.

Just a few hours after Sept. 11, young people started volunteering, giving blood, organizing vigils and anything else to help. We are going to continue to help until the world is a safer place.

and our children are safe from the fear we feel right now.

That's the generation I know.

I don't know who is sitting at Starbucks filing their nails. The people I've seen come together on this campus are full of energy, realized and potentially alike.

I've seen my friends celebrate academic awards while making phone calls for their 30-hour-a-week job, go without sleep for weeks to finish a project and take emergency medicine classes at night while attending class during the day.

Yeah, we're slackers all right — whoops! Was that cynical?

True, we're more privileged than the generations before us, but our parents did that on purpose. More privilege doesn't mean less ambition.

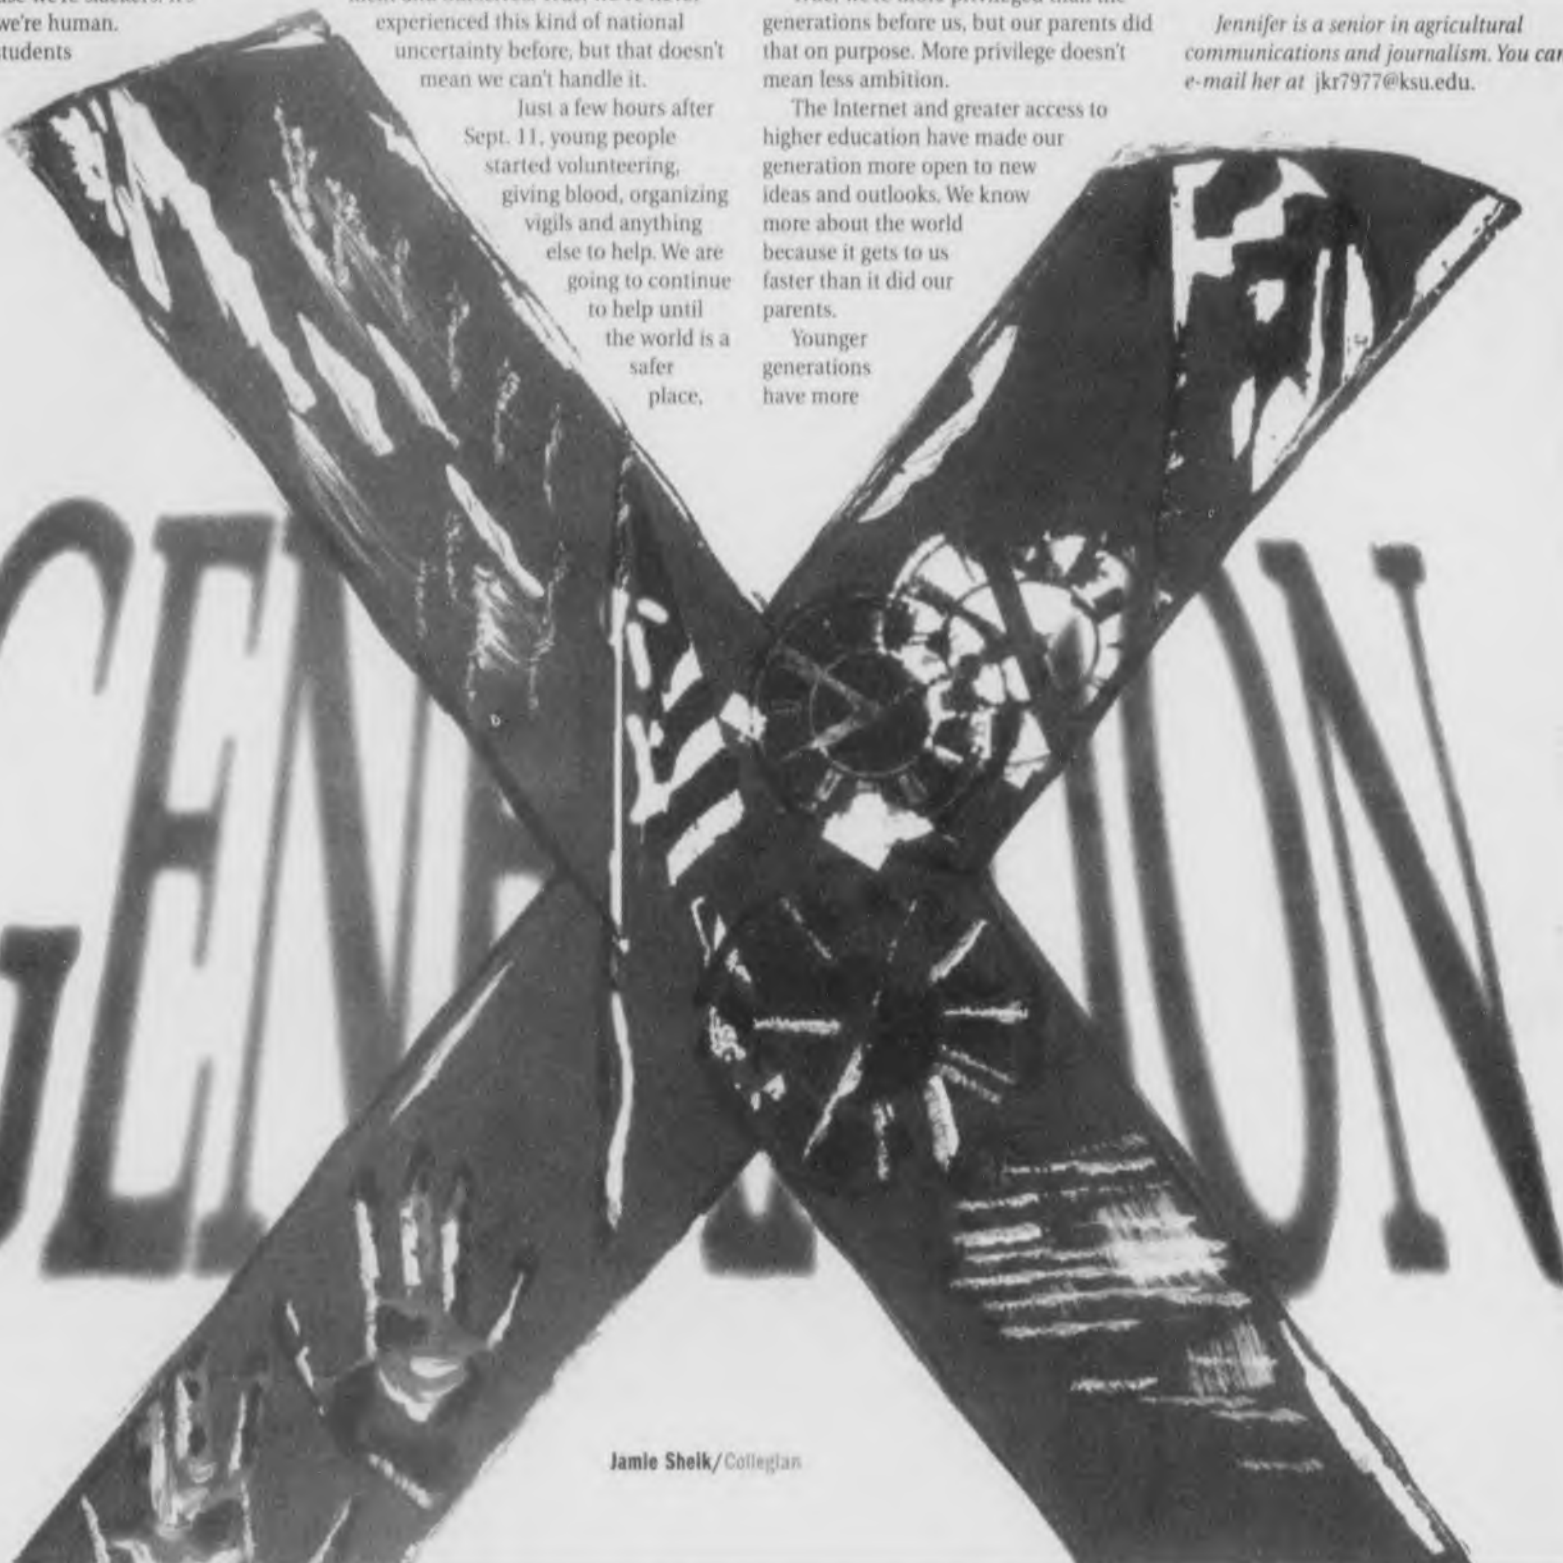

The Internet and greater access to higher education have made our generation more open to new ideas and outlooks. We know more about the world because it gets to us faster than it did our parents.

Younger generations have more of an acceptance of diversity. We will be less likely to have our relationships marred by the anti-Arab sentiment that has erupted in some parts of the nation. Maybe it is because one in three Americans between the ages of 18 and 24 is not Caucasian, according to the National Association of Secretaries of State.

We are preparing to be grown-ups. Some of us are there. Some of us aren't. Maybe that's why we don't have a name. We can't be summed up by a past moment, but rest assured — we're going to make history.

Technology cannot replace humans, rhetorical conversations

I'll admit it. As far as electronic technology goes, I am an idiot.

I have never used a fax machine. I am weary of copiers and nearly have lost fingers in a paper shredder.

Besides, when shopping, I prefer the mall to the Internet, when banking, the teller to the ATM, and when fueling, paying the gas station attendant to the pump machine. I am not good with things that are computer operated or mechanically derived.

Sometimes, when the rest of the world is logging on, signing off and punching buttons, I feel left out. Luckily, I know there is a mass of other people just like me. Whenever in doubt of this, I go shopping and watch the other technologically -inept morons swipe their credit cards three times before realizing which way the magnetic strip is supposed to face.

If I really need reassurance, I stand in the self-check line at Dillons for about 2 minutes before I am convinced just how technologically detailed much of the population is.

As stupid as we might seem, I know we technological degenerates are the lucky ones. We who shy away from these machines are forced into something increasingly more obscure — human contact.

Gas station attendants, grocery checkers and bank tellers slowly are being replaced by beeps and buttons, swipe cards and pin codes. Maybe this is more shocking to me because I was raised in a desolate wheat field in western Kansas. Before college, I never had seen an ATM machine, let alone a self-check stand or a pay-at-the-pump gas station.

On the other hand, I did know the name and family history of my bank teller. I have had many stimulating conversations with gas station attendants, and I could recognize half of the people who worked at my grocery store when I passed them on the street.

These people are part of what makes the world go round, and contact with them is vitally important to daily life.

With all the available technology, it is possible to go a whole day, or even an entire lifetime, without real human contact.

Anything you need can be ordered online and delivered to your doorstep. Or if you do venture outside of your house, it no longer is as necessary to look at people, hand them real money and receive change graciously.

Although life might be simpler, and tasks less time-consuming, nothing can replace a simple smile, a "Thank you," and a "Have a nice day." There is no replacement for seemingly rhetorical conversations about the weather or the upcoming weekend.

For these reasons alone, I do not feel bad that I am technologically-disadvantaged. While my computer skills might be poor, my life is enriched with people.

So for all of you technologically-disabled people, stand proud. While at times you might be left out of conversations about gigabyte, or embarrassed in public by a sudden beeping sound that you have no idea how to silence, remember that you are the lucky ones.

Sense of patriotism, unity lacking in peers, classes

Editor,

It has been three weeks since our nation was bombarded with the worst acts of terrorism that have ever occurred on American soil.

This was a wake-up call for the entire nation, threatening our security, forcing us to evaluate our lives, and it has called us to find unity and pride in what our nation has stood for. Even with a slight distance from the scenes from Sept. 11, the images are so horrific that it's almost impossible to move past what our new reality is.

It still is hard for me to comprehend what has happened and what the aftermath is. I'm still very much outraged and angered with the situation.

What strikes me, though, is how students are reacting in our community. It seems that sense of patriotism and unity is lacking in classes.

Since the terrorist acts, I have sat quietly in classes, taking in what has happened and others' reactions. I can't grasp and refuse to accept the lack of support for our leaders and military.

This is America, a nation that is based on our rights to have different views and where we don't have to agree with what is being done all the time. Nobody should take that away from us, nor will they.

But, in that same respect, we wouldn't have that freedom if we didn't have our leaders and military. While we don't have to like what is happening or the actions that will be taken, it's completely un-American not to support our president or respect our military when they are putting their lives on the line for our freedom.

These are the people who have fought for our rights over and over again. These are the people who have allowed us to live our lives and given us the freedom to sit in classrooms and debate what is going on. Without these heroes, none of us would be where we are today. They allow us to live in our sheltered world and have all the amazing freedoms that other countries can only dream of.

I'm imploring for students and faculty alike to recognize what our leaders are doing to allow us to continue the learning and sharing process. This seems to have been lost in many classes and throughout many debates.

So, while we can all have different opinions and believe different actions should be taken, I think we all could benefit from sitting back and realizing who is allowing us to live in a nation where we are so free and who is defending us so that our liberties aren't lost.

Only with full appreciation and support from all Americans can we begin to fight the battle for our safety and freedom from terrorists.

Purple Wave auction raises $3,495 for disaster relief fund

BY MIKE WATSON
Kansas State Collegian

The Purple Wave Auction Company raised funds Sunday to benefit victims of the Sept. 11 attacks.

The auction raised $3,495, which was donated to the American Red Cross Disaster Relief Fund. Local businesses, Purple Wave auctioneers and workers donated their time as well.

"That's the common theme of the day — donation," auctioneer Aaron McKee said.

Purple Wave has consignment auctions, estate sales, farm auctions, business liquidations and charity auctions.

Mark Yowell said he and his wife, Terry, have never brought anything to the auction to sell before, but because the proceeds were going toward disaster relief, they decided to bring in some donations.

"We usually just buy, but this time we went out to find some stuff to donate to the auction," Mark said.

"We told them (local businesses) what it was for, and they donated it."

The Yowells contributed two $50 tattoo certificates, an oil change, a tire rotation and balance, tanning certificates, and an autographed photograph of Michael Bishop.

Mark said he was interested in acquiring a neon Powercat sign. The sign, which was donated by Schurle Signs, sold for $220, but Mark was not the sign's highest bidder.

Terry said she has helped donate a lot of goods to New York since the attacks. She got her company, Rex Roto Corp. in Council Grove, Kan., to send gloves, masks and other necessities to fire fighters. She also has tried to donate every jar she can find she said.

Jed Hill, auctioneer and junior in animal sciences, said he does not own a computer, but that did not stop him from bidding on a computer monitor glare filter donated by Bear Computer Systems.

"That is charity," McKee said. Bobbie Drew of Leonardville, Kan., said this was the first time she has been to a Purple Wave auction.

She bought material and frames for making crafts. She said she is going to Dallas on Dec. 1 for a craft show.

"I saved a lot of money this way," she said.

"It was a lot of fun. I am coming back.

"I didn't get the wicker headboard that I wanted."

The Cat Track donated 30 go-cart rides to the Purple Wave auction. At $5 a ride, that's a $150 value.

Heath Polkinghorn, co-owner, said he was glad to do it. He said it was for a good cause.

"America is going through a lot right now," he said. "It's more than just putting up an American flag on your home or on your car, but that is good, too. It takes money to cure."

That's why it takes businesses and individuals to donate."

McKee said he thinks the auction was a success.

"There were very few items that didn't bring in what I thought they would," he said.

"I am very happy with the day."

Cats drop 3rd straight, remain winless in Big 12

LUBBOCK, Texas — K-State's 38-19 loss at Texas Tech was every bit as disappointing as the score would indicate.

The loss was K-State's third in a row — the first time the Cats have done so since 1992. The 409 passing yards by Red Raider quarterback Kliff Kingsbury was the most ever surrendered by K-State in an opposing quarterback.

For the sixth time this season, the Cats missed an extra point. Offensively, K-State allowed five sacks.

"We have to get better on offense, defense and the kicking game would be the three major things," head coach Bill Snyder said.

As a result, Snyder laid out the situation plainly for his team after the game.

"I told them that I didn't believe anybody gave up," he said. "I didn't believe at this particular point in time that we were a real good football team. There were a lot of reasons why that might be true. We just aren't good enough right now."

"We have got a lot of things that have to take place in order for us to get back on track."

At the beginning of the game, though, it looked as if K-State was back on track. The Cats jumped to a 7-0 lead on their second possession of the game when quarterback Marc Dunn, who started the game for an injured Eli Roberson, threw a 47-yard touchdown pass down the sideline to receiver Brandon Clark. Sophomore Wade Waltman made the extra point, and the Cats appeared to have returned to form.

However, Texas Tech finished the first half by scoring 17 unanswered points. Quarterback Kliff Kingsbury, despite suffering from a sore thumb, completed 17 of 24 passing attempts for 239 yards in the first half alone.

Sixty of those yards came on one touchdown pass to receiver Wes Welker, who caught the ball wide open after two K-State defenders covering took each other out. The score then was 17-7.

"To me, that was the biggest play of the game," defensive coordinator Phil Bennett said. "That's what got us on our heels."

However, it wasn't freak plays that hurt the K-State defense. It was the game plan, Bennett said.

"That was a poor game plan. We did too much, and I take full responsibility," he said. "That's on me, plain and simple."

"Up to this point, we haven't played terrible, but today, we played bad. It was in direct correlation to our game plan. We had too many possibilities that we worked on, and we didn't do any of it well."

Despite its poor play, the defense did force Kingsbury into two interceptions in the first half, but K-State's offense was unable to convert either turnover into points.

Nevertheless, K-State still seemed to have a certain amount of luck left. With the Cats driving with less than a minute to go in the first half, Dunn threw an interception to LUBBOCK, Texas — Hopes for a K-State win rested on the shoulders of quarterback Marc Dunn on Saturday afternoon in Lubbock, Texas.

But, those hopes remained just that — hopes.

Soon after the Cats' first scoring drive, the recent woes of the offensive unit surfaced once again. By the game's end, players were left mystified.

"It's frustrating because offensively as a whole we are capable of so much more," Dunn said. "Now I just think we have a long ways to go."

K-State's first two drives showed signs the Cats would bounce back from two consecutive losses. The Cats established the running game, feeding the Red Raiders a steady diet of senior Josh Scobey early.

The offense then peaked when Dunn hooked up with senior wide receiver Brandon Clark for a 47-yard touchdown completion. It would be the first and last lead of the game for the Cats.

Scobey said the performance of the offense, as well as the loss, was difficult to deal with because the team had such a great week of practice. For him, it was hard to put into words.

"It hurts real bad because we do these same things in practice every day," he said. "It just seems that come Saturday we aren't executing properly and getting it done on the field."

Scobey, one of the few bright spots in the K-State offense, tallied 111 yards on the ground, adding a touchdown for the Cats late in the third quarter.

By that time, however, it was just an afterthought.

"It's hard to say where we went wrong," Scobey said. "We felt all week that we were ready to play this game."

The wheels fell off when the first quarter came to a close. Dunn completed three of seven passes for 64 yards in that quarter, one of those going to Clark for the Wildcats use 5 games to finish off Baylor in close match

BY DAN SMITH
Kansas State Collegian

K-State needed every game Saturday night to get by Baylor, but in the end, it was the Bears who ran out of steam, dropping a thriller to the Wildcats in five sets in Ahearn Field House.

K-State (10-5, 6-3) set the pace early in the match, rolling off six straight points to open the first game behind strong hits from Jenny Pollard and Lisa Mimick. K-State never led by fewer than six from that point on, using a 5-0 run late in the set to finish off the Bears (11-5, 3-5), 30-15.

"We were serving very aggressively," head coach Suzie Fritz said, "and they weren't able to set some quicks like they wanted to. It became sort of a left side battle, and we're gonna win that battle."

In fact, the Wildcats didn't just win the battle at the net in the first game — they dominated it.

The Bears were kept to a .043 hitting percentage in the first set and committed 13 attack errors, largely because of the K-State's success in the blocking game.

"The first game was absolutely horrible," Baylor hitter Stevie Nicholas said. "K-State's a good blocking team, and they kept sending everything back in the beginning of the game, over and over and over, so I just kind of had to learn my lesson."

Mimick and sophomore Lauren Goehring were the instructors in that lesson, combining for nine blocks in the game. Mimick's six kills led all players in the first set, three more than Nicholas, who came into the match averaging 5.06 per game.

But, the Cats could contain Nicholas only for so long.

In the second game, Nicholas led all hitters with six kills, and the Bears outthit and out dug the Wildcats, but Baylor couldn't overcome two late K-State runs and fell 30-23.

"I felt really good about the first two games and the fact that we were really on their tendencies," Fritz said. "We were frustrating them, and they were making some errors."

Early in the match, it seemed K-State was prepared for everything Baylor had to offer — the Bears were forced into 22 errors in the first two games, compared to just nine for the Wildcats.

"We really had them frustrated, and they were making some unforced errors. But at the same time, we were kind of on what we thought they were going to do," Fritz said. "And they came out and kind of did those things."

But K-State's momentum would slip in the next two games. Nicholas registered nine kills in Baylor's 30-22, game-three win, and seven in the 30-26, fourth-set win to pull the Bears even with the Wildcats and force a fifth game.

"We knew what we had to do, and in practice, we've been kind of focused on being able to come back," Nicholas said. "I think we stopped doubting ourselves and got more confident."

But in the final set, it was Mimick and Goehring who became more confident. After converting five of 12 attack opportunities in games three and four, Goehring made good on both of her attacks, and with the score tied at 10, Mimick scored two of the Wildcats' final five points to put the Bears away for good, 15-11.

"I had a really good feeling that we were going to win," Goehring said. "I just think we're a better team when we play well. We needed a good win like this against a good team, and it's good for us emotionally."

Sophomore middle blocker Lauren Goehring prepares for a kill in Saturday's match against Baylor. The Cats won the match in five sets (30-15, 30-23, 22-30, 26-30, 15-11). The sophomore led the Wildcats with 10 kills, 11 digs and eight blocks, just two blocks shy of a triple-double, and finished second in hitting.

Plot twists keep movie interesting, unpredictable

It's a modern day Bonnie and Clyde ... and Clyde story.

Director

Barry

Levinson

("Sleepers") has struck

gold once again with his story of two bank robbers.

The story follows tough, gritty Joe (Bruce Willis of the "Die Hard" series) and the brainy, hypochondriac Terry (Billy Bob Thornton, "Sling Blade") and their captive, Kate, a bored housewife (Cate Blanchett, who played the title role in 1998's "Elizabeth") who tags along on their escapades.

Somewhere along their run from the law, the two men both fall in love with Kate and further complicate their situation.

The movie is chock full of plot twists as the search for the robbers heightens and speculation circulates among the media as to Kate's real involvement with the two men.

The arguments between Joe and Terry are hilarious and seem to pop up at the most inopportune moments, for instance, during a bank heist.

The acting is first-rate, as most of the main cast members are seasoned actors. They make their characters look convincing, and their interaction with one another couldn't be better.

Album abandons roots

How do you get mainstream recognition while keeping your punk fans? Suicide Machines are taking a shot at the 20-year-old question with their new album, "Steal This Record."

So here's the idea, make the first half of the album appeal to new fans and radio stations while sticking almost all the political messages and punk appeal on the back half.

On this studio-polished album, it's almost hard to believe that they ever recorded a three-second song called, "Punk" on 1998's "Battle Hymns."

The first five songs will get the most attention from those uninitiated in the band's sound. The lead track, "The Killing Blow," is geared up and ready for radio play with the sing-along chorus that will get stuck in your head after one listen with the words, "But you can't take back the things you said / And you can't take back the things you did / Strange how you change when you get older / Funny how the past comes back to haunt you."

Look further down the list, and track four is sure to grab your attention. Yes, they cover R.E.M.'s "It's the End of the World As We Know It."

The track is sure to add a few more numbers to album sales, but it seems like that's the only reason it made the cut.

It isn't like this change in the band is totally new. The band's self-titled 2000 release was notably missing a little of the old edge.

Thankfully, the Suicide Machines haven't betrayed their fans by becoming another Blink-182 replica and totally singing about how much girls hurt them. The political messages on "Steal This Record" still are there, but they just aren't as prominent.

In "The Air We Breathe," the band takes on blind ethnocentrism and patriotism by singing, "Why are we raised to pledge allegiance

/ To a flag that rapes and bleeds us / And we're all free or so we're told / A country with a corrupted soul."

While the messages are there, the band has almost completely abandoned their ska-core roots.

The first reggae riff doesn't pop up until track seven, "Stand Up."

The band members proved on "Battle Hymns" they could switch gears all within one song and go from a quick skank into a punk blast of music in a matter of seconds with songs such as their anti-racism anthem, "Black and White World." On this album, the punk-ska songs just aren't there.

"Steal This Record" shows a different Suicide Machines. The music still is valid compared to what they've done previously, and they don't completely abandon their roots.

The Suicide Machines still are punk, but it's undeniable that this album was produced to have a wider appeal.

Bad script overshadows actor's funny personality

Physical comedy is great, but it can't carry a movie all the way through.

"Corky Romano" puts Chris Kattan in the driver's seat of another "Saturday Night Live" cast member vehicle film. While his personality is hilariously worked into site gags and physical comedy, the script is so lousy no cast could have saved it.

Corky is the estranged son of a mob boss played by Peter Falk ("Columbo") who is too wrapped up in '80s pop music and becoming a veterinarian to worry about extorting money. When Corky's father is up against the wall in a court case that will land him in prison for the rest of his life, he needs to destroy the evidence.

The family needs someone the FBI doesn't know about to infiltrate the bureau and steal the evidence and Corky is its only hope. A computer hacker fabricates a background in law enforcement, and blundering veterinary assistant Corky Romano becomes super-cop Agent Corky Pissant.

Kattan has audiences laughing out loud at any scene that involves him using his body as part of the comedy. He has mastered his craft, and just watching him hold himself is funny.

It's too bad the script for "Corky Romano" is paper-thin. There is a line between funny ridiculous and just plain dumb. Instead of making Kattan seem like a fish out of water in a hard-nosed government establishment, the agents are just as ridiculous as he. It seems like every one of the FBI agents had to do some time training under Don Knotts before getting a job.

The script tries to make too many people funny and forgets that without any straight men, the goofy actors don't stand out. To see how it's done right, Adam Sandler has had much better results with fish-out-of-water movies like "Billy Madison."

The movie still gets its share of laughs as Chris Kattan disarms dangerous situations and proves he's better than the movie they put him in.

Chris Kattan is right up there with actors like Steve Martin and Jim Carrey when it comes to physical comedy, but he needs to choose scripts more carefully.

linebacker Jonathan Hawkins, who then fumbled the ball, which was recovered by tackle Andy Eby. Six plays later, though, Dunn threw his second interception, this time from the Tech 36-yard line with :02 left in the half.

The momentum would stay decidedly on Tech's side in the second half despite an early push from K-State.

To begin the half, the Cats forced Tech into three-and-out. On K-State's resulting possession, however, Waltman missed a 43-yard field goal wide left.

"I think that obviously hurt a great deal — the chance to get within range and make it a touch-down game," Snyder said. "Probably, it had a lot to do, I think, with the momentum of the ball game, and it had a lot to do with just the emotion of the game for the players. You see it as a lost opportunity, just as you see the game as a lost opportunity."

Tech would add another touchdown in the third quarter before K-State scored again, on a 26-yard run from Josh Scobey. Waltman's kicked extra-point missed, to make the score 24-13.

Dunn would add another touchdown with a 4-yard run late in the fourth quarter to close to within 31-19, but by that time, the result was decided.

Now the Cats are left wondering how the same team that almost knocked off Oklahoma has fallen to the Big 12 North cellar.

"I just don't know what to say right now, at this point in time," running back Josh Scobey said, "because it really hurts, and it's hard."

DEFENSE

score. Dunn finished the ballgame with only 13 completions on 40 attempts and was picked off twice and sacked five times. Dunn said the offense prepared well for this battle, but just didn't show it come game time.

"We were as prepared as you can be," he said. "When you get on the field, though, the X's and O's are different than they are in practice."

Offensive coordinator Ron Hudson said that he felt Dunn responded well for being thrown in a tough situation, but there also are many things he has to learn to get better, he said.

"I think the lack of experience caught up with him when deciding what receivers to throw to," he said. "That's all part of the learning process, and it was difficult to be thrown in that kind of environment."

As the offense was sputtering, K-State's defense gave the team opportunities to turn the tide in the football game. The Cats registered three interceptions of Tech's quarterback Cliff Kingsbury. No picks, however, turned into K-State points.

"We stopped them with interceptions, but obviously that wasn't enough to get the win," senior lineman Andy Eby said. "We need to make positive plays out of the turnovers we get."

The Tech defense was deserving of much of the credit, Dunn said.

"They did some good things out there that kept us in a bind," he said. "When that happens, you start to second-guess yourself."

Dunn said this game could have proven that K-State could respond to adversity. In the end, however, it put another notch in K-State's loss column and more questions in the minds of players, coaches and fans.

"Our backs were against the wall, and this game was the chance to play K-State football," he said. "We just found out there are many aspects of our game that we need to improve."

We do.

If you are interested in being part of a brotherhood of a lifetime, then we may be what you're looking for.

We are an established K-State fraternity chapter that values diversity in our members. We are looking for quality men who could benefit from being one of our brothers and contribute to our chapter.

We don't believe in hazing. Never have, never will. Respect should be earned, not demanded. All of our brothers are treated as equals. We also pride ourselves in a long history of campus leadership and involvement. Maybe fraternity life is something you want to consider. You'll never know until you find out for yourself.

U.S. intensifies attacks on Taliban positions

BY PAULINE JELINEK
Associated Press Writer

WASHINGTON, D.C. — The front lines of battles between the Taliban militia and rebel forces won't be a very safe place for Taliban fighters, Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld said Monday as U.S. warplanes carried out the biggest daylight attacks so far over Afghanistan.

The daylight raids were followed by night-time attacks, and Rumsfeld indicated much more bombing was planned.

A senior U.S. defense official, speaking on condition of anonymity, said Monday's plan was to attack 18 to 20 targets, including some that had been struck previously as well as Taliban troop concentrations.

U.S. airstrikes have targeted Taliban troop formations for several days and will focus more on front-line Taliban fighters once the Pentagon gets better information from rebel forces, Rumsfeld said at a news conference.

On Sunday, the U.S. military added leaflets to the bombs and food being dropped in Afghanistan, he said.

"We're working to make clear to the Afghan people that we support them and we want to help free their nation from the grip of the Taliban and their foreign terrorist allies," he said. He said the Taliban are accomplished liars who make ridiculous claims about U.S. strikes killing hundreds of civilians.

He added a warning to Taliban fighters who might feel the front lines — virtually untouched by American strikes in the nine-day campaign — are relatively safe.

"I suspect that in the period ahead, that's not going to be a very safe place to be," Rumsfeld said.

Rumsfeld spoke after American warplanes launched the biggest daylight attacks so far over Afghanistan, and followed them up with night raids.

The USS Theodore Roosevelt joined three aircraft carriers already in the region, the Navy confirmed Monday.

Air crews for the first time Sunday added leaflets — in the local languages of Pashtu and Dari — to the drops already being made of humanitarian food packets for the Afghan population, said Air Force Gen. Richard Myers, chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, who appeared with Rumsfeld.

One leaflet shows a Western soldier in camouflage and helmet shaking hands with a man in traditional Afghan dress in front of a mountain scene.

"The partnership of nations is here to assist the people of Afghanistan," the leaflet said.

Another depicts a radio transmitting tower and sketches of radios and tells times and radio stations to tune to for what it calls "Information Radio." The broadcasts began earlier, but leaflets telling people to listen were delayed because of windy conditions last week, a Pentagon official said.

Over the weekend, more than 68,000 ration packets were dropped, bringing the total to 275,000 since the effort began.

Bombing targets were being expanded daily as military planners crossed some off the list and added others, Rumsfeld said.

"The target (plan) that existed at the outset has been significantly enhanced by additional information from the ground," he said. "As a result, the number of targets that are available have continued to be roughly the number that they were the day before."

Rumsfeld said American military officials believe the Taliban still has some planes and helicopters untouched by bombs.

He took issue with Taliban government reports that U.S. bombing has killed hundreds of civilians, saying "some of the numbers (claimed) are ridiculous" and the "Taliban leadership and al-Qaeda (the network run by Osama bin Laden) are accomplished liars."

The Taliban has said some 200 people died when the village of Karam was bombed last week.

Without giving a number, Rumsfeld acknowledged some Afghan civilians have been unintended casualties of the strikes.

The anti-terrorist attacks will not end during Afghanistan's cold, snowy winter, Myers said.

STRAW support
Houses provide energy efficiencyBY MICHAEL WATSON
Kansas State Collegian

The big, bad wolf doesn't have the lungs to blow this house down.

Rod Harms, 1982 K-State graduate in landscape architecture, builds straw houses that are almost impossible to knock down. The bales of hay are entombed in concrete. This is the fourth house he has built.

Harms said straw houses cost a little more money to build, but it is worth a little more money. There is a formula appraisers use that factors in energy cost savings.

"The straw house is much more energy efficient," Harms said.

"It has an R-40 rating, whereas fiberglass insulation has an R-24 rating. You're approaching a house that is twice as efficient."

Not only is the house more efficient, but it is wheat straw, he said. Wheat straw is an agricultural waste product.

"Hay was bought from right around the corner," he said, "by the tavern. There were some other places that provided hay, all within 10 to 15 minutes of the site."

The hay bales are stacked along the exterior of the house and rebar pushed through the bales every few feet to lock the bales into place. Chicken wire is placed on the inside and outside. Stucco will go on the inside and outside. The stucco waterproofs the house.

Building straw houses also is labor-intensive. Harms employs craftsmen and 15 to 20 students of different majors to construct the house.

Simon Van Boening, senior in criminology, said the straw house is structurally as good as any other house.

"You have to cover it good," he said. "But if you do that, it won't rot at all. You could look in there in 50 years and it would still look the same."

"It will look like any other house that has been stuccoed," he said.

"You couldn't tell it was a straw house unless you were there when they built it."

The house will include 2,700 finished square feet and 1,000 unfinished square feet. The upstairs has a living room, a bedroom, a master suite, a kitchen, room for a washer and dryer and two full bathrooms. The basement has another living room, a bedroom, a full bathroom and storage. The house also has a three-car garage and a wrap-around deck.

"It will take another week to get the bales in," Van Boening said. "It will take another month to stucco the outside. You can't stucco below freezing. It won't cure right."

Harms said the interior framing of the house will be like any other house in Manhattan. The interior walls between rooms are typical sheet rock walls.

The interior walls next to the straw bales are stucco and plaster.

Harms said he likes the style of the straw house. The thick walls allow the windows to be set back a

Hale solving steam leak
problemsBY DANA STRONGIN
Kansas State Collegian

Sunday evening's steam leak in Hale Library took its toll on campus for employees of the library, the Division of Facilities and K-State Police on Monday morning.

Campus police alerted facilities employees to remedy damages resulting from the leak, which originated from a steam line break. The steam was under control later Sunday night, but more work was necessary Monday.

"Heat caused the fire alarm, and the officers responded," said Lt. Richard Herrman of the campus police. "We got a hold of facilities, and they are doing everything they need to do."

The library was back in order by Monday mid-morning with the help of facilities, said Jean Darbyshire, director of Administrative Services for the library.

One main concern that remains for the library is ensuring all the extra humidity is removed, Darbyshire said.

"The only thing left to finish is cooling down the building and taking the humidity out," she said.

"Humidity and books are not good together because the books can get damaged or moldy."

The steam caused damage to several computers, but they appeared to be functioning properly Monday afternoon. Problems with K-State Online then arose, causing it to be temporarily shut down. The shutdown was necessary because the steam got water on the servers. K-State Online was back to being functional late Monday evening.

The automatically moving shelving units in Hale 117 were damaged and were successfully fixed Monday, Darbyshire said.

Accidents involving steam or water are not uncommon, Herrman said. "From time to time, there will be steam leaks or water leaks, often involving an air conditioning vent or a drain," he said.

Hale has suffered from several small steam leaks before, Darbyshire said. "We have just never seen anything of this size," she said.

"But we are up and ready to roll," she said. "By Tuesday morning, everything should be back and running."

RCPD officers link suspects in Manhattan vehicle burglaries to drug purchases

BY ALYSON RAULETZ
Kansas State Collegian

Revealing an 11-person conspiracy, police officers discovered stolen property associated with 20 vehicle burglaries after they served a search warrant Thursday at 1104 Yuma St., Apt. B.

Officers realized the burglaries, which have occurred during the past two months, were related to each other when they interviewed suspects two weeks before they served the warrant.

At the site, officers also found drug paraphernalia and controlled substances.

"Our main concern is that the original crimes are being used to foster more serious crimes," said Lieutenant Tim Hegarty of the investigations division at the Riley County Police Department.

Hegarty said that through their investigation, they believe the suspects are breaking into cars and stealing CDs, credit cards, wallets and checkbooks to purchase narcotics. They have no evidence that the suspects are using the substances beyond their own personal use.

Officers have investigated the 20 vehicle burglaries, but there could be more, he said. So far, there have been two arrests, he said, but the RCPD will not release their names because there still are nine more arrests pending, which could mean more burglaries.

Vehicle burglaries related to this two-month conspiracy have not yet occurred on campus, he said, but they have occurred around campus and throughout Manhattan. The burglaries are not concentrated in any area, he said.

College students tend to be victims of vehicle burglary, he said, and should take extra precautions.

"We want to inform college students as much as possible," he said. "They need to be careful to not keep wallets, checkbooks or anything valuable in their car."

"We can't stop all the crimes, but students can prevent additional theft of these items."

He said that in most of the thefts, the victims admitted they had left their personal items out in the open.

"People are looking for quick scores," he said. "If they look at a car and there are not items left in plain view and everything is secure, they are most likely going to bypass it and look for something more vulnerable."

He said local banks and businesses have helped the investigation by providing financial requests and bank receipts showing the suspects' forgeries.

"The businesses have been very quick to respond," he said. "Sometimes, with the help of the banks, we knew about the forgeries before the victims did."

He said the department hopes to complete its investigation by the end of October. The investigation is complex, he said, and making the last nine arrests will be difficult.

"We've identified the suspects. It's just a question of finding them," he said. "Locating them will be a problem."

Wichita attorney brings suit to pay poor inmates

WICHITA — Thousands of people who spent time in the city jail for not paying municipal court fines are entitled to more than $17 million in damages, their lawyer said.

Attorney Kiehl Rathbun said at a hearing Friday that the nearly 7,500 former inmates jailed under Wichita's time to pay docket spent a combined 148,000 days behind bars. At $5 an hour, what the city pays poor defendants who work off their fines, that amounts to $17.7 million, Rathbun said.

City lawyers said Rathbun's calculations were unrealistic and that he was withholding financial information that would reflect a more reasonable figure of the inmates' lost wages.

Rathbun has filed a class-action lawsuit on behalf of those jailed under contempt of court citations for not paying fines. The suit alleges that municipal court judges violated state law by ordering jail without having hearings to determine a defendant's ability to pay.

Stovall to defend predator law in U.S. Supreme Court

TOPEKA — For a second time, Kansas Attorney General Carla Stovall is preparing to defend the state's sexual predator law before the U.S. Supreme Court.

Stovall will present arguments Oct. 30 defending the state's practice of keeping sex offenders locked in treatment programs after their release from prison.

In 1997, the justices ruled 5-4 in an earlier Kansas case that the sexual predator law does not violate criminals' constitutional rights.

That case involved convicted pedophile Leroy Hendricks, who testified that he couldn't control his impulses to molest children. He remains in the state's sexual predator treatment unit at Larned State Hospital.

State justices said the law violated the due process rights of people who are capable of controlling their behavior.

Two teens suffer injuries after falling nearly 40 feet

TOPEKA — Two 14-year-old Topeka boys remained hospitalized Monday after a fall of nearly 40 feet from a bridge.

Injured in the fall were Jason Beckwith and Ray Cox. Cox is in critical condition at Children's Mercy Hospital in Kansas City, Mo., with multiple broken bones and other injuries.

Beckwith is in St. Francis Hospital in Topeka, where his injuries are not considered life threatening.

Lt. John Sidwell said, the boys were injured in the fall Sunday afternoon on the Kansas Avenue Bridge in north Topeka. The boys told police they were walking on the sidewalk along the bridge when they decided to walk on the sidewalk in the center of the bridge span.

However, Sidwell said, when the bridge was reconstructed several years ago the center sidewalk was removed. When the boys jumped the concrete wall they fell about 40 feet, landing on a parked truck.

Fire Capt. Richard Woltkamp said Cox apparently became tangled in a boom on the truck. Beckwith, who suffered a leg injury, was able to get help by flagging down a passing motorist.

Escapee releases captives, shoots partner in standoff

FORESTBURG, Texas — One of two escaped inmates holed up in a North Texas farmhouse freed his two captives early Monday, then shot and wounded the second fugitive to end the standoff.

While jail escapee Gerald Gantt slept inside the house, his partner Bob Leach helped to free the two hostages, whose hands had been tied. The hostages then escaped through a bathroom window, law officers said.

Vincent Forrester, 65, and his wife, Irma, fled behind hay bales near their home. Before Leach could escape, officers said, Gantt awoke and the two suspects began talking.

Law officers, who had been negotiating with Leach, then heard gunfire at 3:50 a.m. Leach surrendered and Gantt was sent to a hospital for treatment of a gunshot wound to the abdomen. A large cache of weapons was found inside the farmhouse.

"We were definitely praying and hoping everything would come out OK," Mark Forrester, the couple's son said.

Class ring creates unity among students, alumni

BY KECIA N. SEYB
Kansas State Collegian

K-State alumni and students will have no problem picking one another out of a crowd — those who choose can be linked by a unifying ring on their hands.

The KSU Alumni Association and the K-State Student Union unveiled K-State's official class ring Wednesday in the K-State Student Union. Spencer Stelljes, junior in political science, who came up with the idea of the ring, said the main motivation to create a single official ring was to join all K-State students and alumni.

Other schools such as Texas A&M and Notre Dame have had traditional rings for many years, Stelljes said, and when he attended a conference at Texas Tech and heard about its ring, he came back to K-State to spread the word. And the word is spreading.

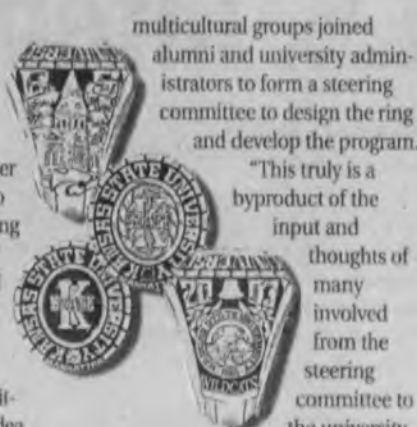

"The word's definitely getting out," said Courtney Marshall, director of member services for the Alumni Association and ring committee coordinator. "We've got a lot of interest. We hope to have 200 or 300 people receiving the ring."

In the past, some K-State students have bought different class rings, but there was no tradition, Marshall said.

"There was no affinity," she said. "Maybe it was just a Powercat — it had no real symbolism."

Marshall said the images of Anderson Hall, the Blumont Bell and the Powercat tell K-State's story and history.

A survey of more than 500 students last year spurred the ring's creation and appearance, Stelljes said. Also, students from residence halls, Panhellenic Council, the K-State-Salina campus and multicultural groups joined alumni and university administrators to form a steering committee to design the ring and develop the program.

"This truly is a byproduct of the input and thoughts of many involved from the steering committee to the university to the Alumni Association, so it truly does speak to all K-Staters," Stelljes said.

ArtCarved produces the ring, which is available in three different kinds of gold — white gold or yellow gold, normal gold or antiquated in 10, 14 or 18 karats — and with a synthetic amethyst, diamond or cubic zirconia.

Before they can order the ring, traditional students must have a minimum of 60 credit hours; transfer students must have 90 hours; others have to obtain a degree.

"It's something you have to earn," said Ted Gilmore, programs manager for the Midwest area of ArtCarved. "Once you've completed that part, you know you're probably going to stay, and it gives you a chance to wear your ring your senior year."

The price of the ring starts around $300, Marshall said, depending on which style the person chooses. Each semester, she said, the ring will be presented to the eligible students during a ceremony over which President Jon Wefald will preside. The first will be April 28, the weekend of Open House, she said. The actual ring is in tooling right now and should be available in the Union Bookstore in about five weeks.

Children's Service League helps troubled living groups

BY KECIA N. SEYB
Kansas State Collegian

Parents in Manhattan who need advice raising their children have a place to turn — Kansas Children's Service League Parenting Education.

The Kansas Children's Service League of Manhattan, 217 Southwind Place, is a private, non-profit agency that serves children and families through adoption, foster care and parenting classes.

The Parenting Education classes are funded partially through the United Way.

"The parenting ed offers help to anyone in the community who is interested in learning more about parenting," Susan Haremza, parenting education supervisor, said. "It's also for those who are mandated to attend."

Haremza, who teaches some of the classes, said classes could be mandated through domestic court or through juvenile court because children are in out-of-home care.

The classes meet for two hours once a week, for about six weeks. Class sizes usually are between eight and 12 people. Classes include such subjects as basic parenting, common sense parenting and active parenting of teens, which is geared toward teen-aged parents. All of the curricula is research-based, Haremza said.

"We want them to learn from each other as well as the research-based material," she said. "These are usually things that need a little fine-tuning. There are not any absolute answers in anything we offer — they're just things to try out and see if they fit."

"They're kind of like tools to add to a toolbox."

The parents are assigned homework sheets each week, she said, and from those, they are gauged on whether they're understanding the concepts and their utilization of them.

All of the programs are based on positive discipline, she said.

"We try to tell people to deal with things up front and in positive ways rather than punishment. Many of the techniques are just ways to turn things around so the same mistakes aren't continuously made. We talk about not using any kind of physical punishment."

In Manhattan, more cases of abuse in the home occur than one might think, said Tina Long, marketing and communications helping in the COMMUNITY

This is a weekly series profiling a United Way agency.

"These things even do happen in Manhattan and within this county."

According to the 2000 Kids' Court Data Book, she said, per 1,000 children in Riley County, there were 599 reports of child abuse and neglect. Of those, 105 were substantiated.

Haremza said the classes can help parents find ways to parent rather than resorting to physical punishment.

"Many people believe in physical discipline," she said. "When it gets to the point that it becomes excessive, it becomes a problem. Overuse of something is when the problem becomes noticeable, and people need help."

Kansas Children's Service League works to help adoption, family preservation and foster care services. Statewide, it employs approximately 600 people in 40 different locations and serves about 50,000 children and families annually.

Haremza said the classes are for all parents who might want tips on parenting, including students or teen-agers who are married or single.

"If they feel like they're under stress, we can help them," she said.

We do.

If you are interested in being part of a brotherhood of a lifetime, then we may be what you're looking for.

We are an established K-State fraternity chapter that values diversity in our members. We are looking for quality men who could benefit from being one of our brothers and contribute to our chapter.

We don't believe in hazing. Never have, never will. Respect should be earned, not demanded. All of our brothers are treated as equals. We also pride ourselves in a long history of campus leadership and involvement.

Maybe fraternity life is something you want to consider. You'll never know until you find out for yourself.

K-State football team deserves fan support during losing streak

When points are scored, games are won and our team is ranked, it is easy to be a K-State football fan. It is easy to believe, support, cheer and have pride.

But when a few games are lost and the season looks more dreary than anticipated, it is harder to stand behind your team. After all, you feel let down.

As most K-State fans know, it took several years for our team to be built up to the level it has been at.

During that time there was a core group of fans who went to games — rain or shine — to support the Cats.

In those days, if they won, it was a bonus. If they lost, the fans had fun just going to the game.

Through the years, they showed love, devotion and undying support for a team few believed in.

So, we have lost a few games. After an incredible eight years, we are bound to have a down season or two.

We need to learn something from the die hard fans of the past: their devotion.

The football team has brought K-State a lot of recognition from around the country. Some might argue the football team has put Manhattan on the map. Over the last few years, they also have brought fans a lot of happiness and pride.

In times of trouble, we need to stand firm.

Let's not prove to be fair weather fans; instead, let's continue to go to games, tailgate, and rally in support. We should treat them with the respect teams deserve.

We need to believe in them. Maybe the power of 50,000 cheering for them, win or lose, will make more of a difference than we can imagine.

Well, at least the volleyball team won.

Great, now we suck in all of our sports.

Wildcats, huh? What, did they finish dead last? Oh yeah, they had a good day though.

I would just like to thank the Kinko's employees who called a cab for me after I passed out on their floor.

To whoever set off the smoke alarm in the library: thanks a lot. Now I am outside studying with the squirrels.

I think the guys with the little green books are pretty doggone cool.

As I was walking through campus, I saw an American flag made out of acorns and sticks. Damn, those squirrels are good.

This is to the people who live upstairs — it is 49 degrees. Turn off your air conditioner and turn on your heater.

Yes, K-State fans go to the game early, stay late and cheer loud. Our team needs us more than ever.

Breaking news: the terrorists have kidnapped our football players and replaced them with some lousy sidekicks.

Is it just me or does DJ Clue piss everyone off?

Our football team is so only going to the toilet bowl this year.

Does anyone ever wonder why there is braille on a drive up ATM machine?

I think we should replace Eli Roberson with El Macho Burocho, the winningest cock fighter in all of Mexico.

Hamster dreams are the most powerful.

ANIMAL INSTINCTS

Sex without love cheapens union

Sex is good. With the exception of a few extremists on either end of the ideological spectrum, most people probably would agree sexual relations are beneficial when placed in the proper context.

The tricky part is defining that context. I don't claim to have the perfect definition, but I can tell you casual sex doesn't fit into it. Sex outside of a love-based relationship only harms and cheapens sex.

Micah Hawkinson

Casual sex has just one purpose: to sate an animal appetite. Many people see it as a consequence-free way to make themselves feel good. Unfortunately, they don't realize casual sex has some very significant and far-reaching consequences for everyone involved.

Physically, casual sex is one of the most dangerous things you can do. STDs are rampant in our culture, and an unadvised romp in bed with a stranger could get you a nice case of syphilis, gonorrhea or even the big one — HIV.

Although condoms do work most of the time, they certainly aren't guaranteed to do so — especially if they aren't used correctly. For example, a 1993 study by Dr. David G. Collart suggested condoms can have a failure rate as high as 35 percent, or about one in three.

Unwanted pregnancy is another problem that can arise from casual sex.

Again, condoms don't always work as they were meant. Not even the Pill is a failsafe device for avoiding pregnancy. According to Planned Parenthood, the Pill works 95 percent of the time when used normally. Conversely, it has a 5-percent failure rate.

Unwanted pregnancy places the involved parties in a moral quagmire. Should they abort the fetus or carry it to term and put it up for adoption? The decision is rendered all the more difficult by the lack of commitment in the first place. Women in this situation find themselves left with a problem they hadn't considered when they agreed to having a one-night stand.

Although the possible physical consequences of casual sex are sobering, its moral and emotional consequences are even more important. Most proponents of casual sex argue that it is beneficial because it satisfies a physical appetite with minimal trouble and emotional involvement.

The problem is, sex is more than just an appetite. It's a constant dynamic in our relationships with one another. Casual sex between friends has the potential to ruin a relationship. I know of several people whose friendships were torn apart as a result of one-night stands.

When people have sex just to fulfill a physical need, it takes away some of their humanity. Casual sex causes them to look upon others as objects to be used. It encourages them to overlook the intrinsic value of their partners in the quest for personal gratification.

In addition to reducing their esteem for others, casual sex has a negative effect on participants' future relationships.

Sex is more than just a physical act. It's also a beautiful way to express love. Casual sex cheapens the mystery and wonder of sexual union and transforms it into a vulgar search for physical pleasure. It's like tossing a priceless piece of jewelry into a pigpen.

Whatever you do, don't buy into the lie. Instant gratification isn't worth the potential risks and heartache casual sex brings with it.

Don't cast your pearls before swine.

Clash of the Columnists

Clash of the Columnists is a weekly rotating series. Each week, two columnists will write columns taking a stance on an issue that was assigned to them.

Casual intercourse completely natural

We're animals. Highly evolved, intelligent, emotional, spiritual, creative animals.

We attribute emotional and moral values to parts of our world so as not to become gluttonous or hedonists. This stigma is thickly wrapped around the American concept of sex and is the detriment of our society.

Casual sex is the archetype of moral indecency for many religious and social leaders. They see sex as something to be restricted by marriage or serious long-term relationships.

This social prohibition of casual sex has been about as effective as alcohol prohibition of years gone by. We learned banning something doesn't remove it. It simply pushes it underground.

Desires are not bad; they're innate. We cannot cut them out of our being. They're part of who we are as humans. It doesn't mean we should run around bumping everything that moves, but it means we should not repress our natural sexual appetites.

Arguments might be posed that an open, casual sexual relationship could be bad for your health. Rampant sexually transmitted diseases, AIDS and pregnancy all are vehemently preached as consequences of poor sexual decisions.

That's sex, period. The only way to avoid all of this is to abstain altogether. It's a viable option for many, but not for everyone. For those of us who have decided to get it on, I pose the argument casual sex can be safer than sex within a relationship.

By relationship, I mean everything from dating to marriage. Anything that puts two people in a mutually exclusive situation where there is an emotional bond that ties the two people together. This mutually exclusive bond often is the downfall of communication between partners.

With a casual sex relationship, where there is little or even no emotional bond, often there is completely open communication. There is no fear of hurting the other person, only of ending the sexual activity.

With nothing to lose, it's easier to admit sexual activities to your partner so you both can be aware of the consequences of your actions.

It's the difference between going to war and walking down the street. When your country is at war, you are aware of the possibility of getting shot. If you get shot walking down the street, it should come as a surprise.

It's all about knowing what you're walking into.

Notwithstanding, this all assumes that everyone gets into a relationship for emotional care for the other person. I would venture to guess that there have been, on occasions, people who start dating someone in an attempt to get laid.

They lie through their teeth about how they care for their partner, and in the end all they care about is meeting personal needs.

How is this any better than a relationship openly devoid of emotional ties? At least in a casual sex relationship you know what you see is what you get.

The only real gray area in this discussion would be the infamous friend with benefits. Maybe it's an ex you're still attracted to; maybe it's a good friend that you know dating would never work out, but they just have that effect on you.

Whatever provokes the interest, it can be the best of both worlds. There is a familiarity, while at the same time you both know dating isn't a choice. It can also be the worst possible option. If feelings get involved, you run the chance of losing the friend.

It's a precarious position, but it can be a viable option to the pain and frustration of an emotional relationship.

Casual sex is seen as an alternative. That's it. If you're lucky enough to find someone to love and get love in return, hang on to them. If you're not so fortunate, there are other options out there. Just be safe.

Football team instills pride in dedicated student fans

Editor,
This story is about the great rise, triumph and sudden fall we all have witnessed in the K-State football program. I remember when I was nine years old, I went with my family to the K-State versus the University of Kansas game at Wagner Field.

Going into the game, which was in 1988, both teams were winless and vying for the cellar dweller of the Big 8. The score was tied at 17 late in the game. K-State drove down the field and had a chance at the end of the game to win with a field goal, but to the woeful Wildcats' demise, the kick was blocked and the game ended in a tie. It was the poorest excuse for a football game I can remember.

Just 10 wonderful years later, K-State football was ranked No. 1 in the country and vying for a national title. The team was tops in the whole football world, thanks to a man named Bill Snyder.

This story is known by many, but it is very special to me because I have been and will continue to be one of the proudest K-state fans ever, win or lose. K-State has been in my blood forever and will continue to be after I no longer am here.

The poorest excuse for a game I ever saw in 1988 was overshadowed by the best game I ever have witnessed last season at home against Nebraska. As the snow came down like in a fairy tale, we scored the winning touchdown to swipe the victory and the Big 12 North crown from the Huskers. It was pure poetry.

I just want to thank Snyder, the assistant coaches and especially all the players who participated in the rise of one of the worst programs in college football history.

We really do appreciate every last one of you. It was a wonderful stint of greatness. You guys have greatly added to my college experience here at K-State, and I hope this will continue for kids who attend this university in the future. This is undeniable proof that dreams really can come true, and who knows? Maybe the sun will shine once again on this small little Midwestern town in Northeast Kansas called Manhattan.

K-State gains recognition for blood drive success

BY MICHAEL WATSON
Kansas State Collegian

K-State was named the American Red Cross' College/University Sponsor of the Year for the second consecutive year.

Nancy Powell, K-State's blood services representative, said K-State is unique because of its involvement from many different areas of campus.

The blood drive has support from President Jon Wefald, the administration and the students coordinating and sponsoring the drive.

Powell said she thinks K-State does a wonderful job with its blood drive.

"K-State's commitment to saving lives is wonderful," Powell said. "I would like to thank the administration and the 10 student organizations that coordinate the blood drives. This enables the Red Cross to collect the blood needed by hospital patients in our region."

Stacey Huertter, senior in elementary education and student coordinator of the K-State blood drive, said the award is an honor for K-State.

"With what's going on in the world, K-State has realized there is a need for blood."

She said she is positive that K-State will reach its goal for donations.

There was a good turnout for registration on Monday.

People who were turned away at the community blood drive will have a chance to give blood now. Also, donors do not have to be students.

Powell said there are hundreds of people who help make the K-State blood drive a success.

"Not only do we have volunteers from 10 organizations, but we also have a number of people that come in and help," she said.

Clay Myers-Bowman, executive director of the Riley County American Red Cross, said K-State student volunteers show a high level of enthusiasm during the blood drive.

"Students on the planning committee set out what they're going to do, and they follow through with a high level of energy and enthusiasm," he said.

The K-State Red Cross Club just got registered as a campus organization.

"We are getting geared up for the K-State Red Cross club," Myers-Bowman said. "They are really going to explode during K-State collected 1,700 units of blood at last year's blood drive. Powell said the goal for this year's blood drive is higher than last year's goal of 874 units.

She said the goal for this fall is 965 units.

"There will be more hours for people to donate," she said. "More people will want to give because of the recent events."

New military history institute will expand 20th-century studies

BY GABRIEL BREAZEALE
Kansas State Collegian

K-State announced a new Institute for Military History and 20th Century Studies on Friday. The institute is the result of a collaboration between the Eisenhower Foundation and the university.

The institute will allow graduate students, doctoral students and K-State faculty access to 22 million pages of Dwight D. Eisenhower manuscripts at the Eisenhower Foundation's Presidential Library in Abilene, Kan. The manuscripts include pre-presidential, presidential and post-presidential years.

Eisenhower documents, coupled with K-State's new institute initiatives for oral history programs, visiting scholars, guest speakers and symposiums will expand study of the Cold War and 20th-century history at K-State.

"The relevance is clear. While the planning for this began well before the Sept. 11 attacks, this institute can look at all kinds of questions that are directly connected to the current conflict: What explains the Soviet defeat in Afghanistan?" David Stone, assistant professor of history, said.

"To what degree is the American experience in Vietnam relevant? What has produced the success or failure of previous attempts to combat terrorism?"

As Supreme Commander of Allied Expeditionary Forces, Eisenhower commanded the invasion of Normandy. He also was president of the United States from 1953 to 1961.

"(The institute is) one of the very top programs of military history in the United States," Mark Parillo, associate professor of history, said.

Eighteen months of planning and more than a decade of discussions between several people, including K-State President Jon Wefald; John Carlin, archivist of the United States; and various organizations made the collaboration a reality.

The Eisenhower Foundation was created in 1945. It received the Eisenhower family home in 1946 as a gift from the Eisenhower family.

During the past 56 years a library, museum, chapel and visitor center have been added to the grounds.

In addition to K-State's Eisenhower Foundation collaboration, a different cooperative graduate program with emphasis in military history was created between K-State and the U.S. Army Command and the General Staff College at Fort Leavenworth, Kan. The cooperative enables officers in the U.S. armed forces to earn doctorates in military history through K-State.

The institute has several services in development for K-State. It plans to add relevant books, journals, scholarly works, source collections and databases that will be made electronically accessible through Hale Library.

The Eisenhower Foundation's Presidential Library plans to gather American war veteran interviews of WWII through the Gulf War and collect diaries, letters and memorabilia of the period from 1945 to 1990.

West Texas A&M's Kristen McDonald and K-State's Amanda Gigot travel the course at Fox Hill Stables last weekend during the Wildcats' first home show.

Cats dominate, sponsor first equestrian show

BY DAN SMITH
Kansas State Collegian

K-State's Western equestrian team made history last weekend by being host to its first home show at Fox Creek Stables in Manhattan on Saturday and Sunday.

The Wildcats competed in the team portion of the event against West Texas, Texas A&M and Oklahoma State. Individuals from Sul Ross State University and Southeastern Oklahoma State also made the trip.

K-State started the tournament hot Saturday morning, taking high-point honors with 26 in the team competition, edging out Texas A&M by five points and West Texas A&M by 10. Oklahoma State finished with 15 total points, and head coach Lindsay Briendenthal said, the team's success was to be expected.

"It wasn't that big of a surprise," she said. "We have some good riders, and they were able to perform well this weekend."

Senior co-captain Kelly Gratny placed first in Open Reining and second in Open Horsemanship to lead K-State with High-Point Rider honors. Sophomore Darcy Ferguson also turned in a second-place performance in Intermediate Horsemanship on the first day.

"Kelly is a very consistent rider," administrative assistant Jodi Pike said. "We can count on her for a top-two finish at any show."

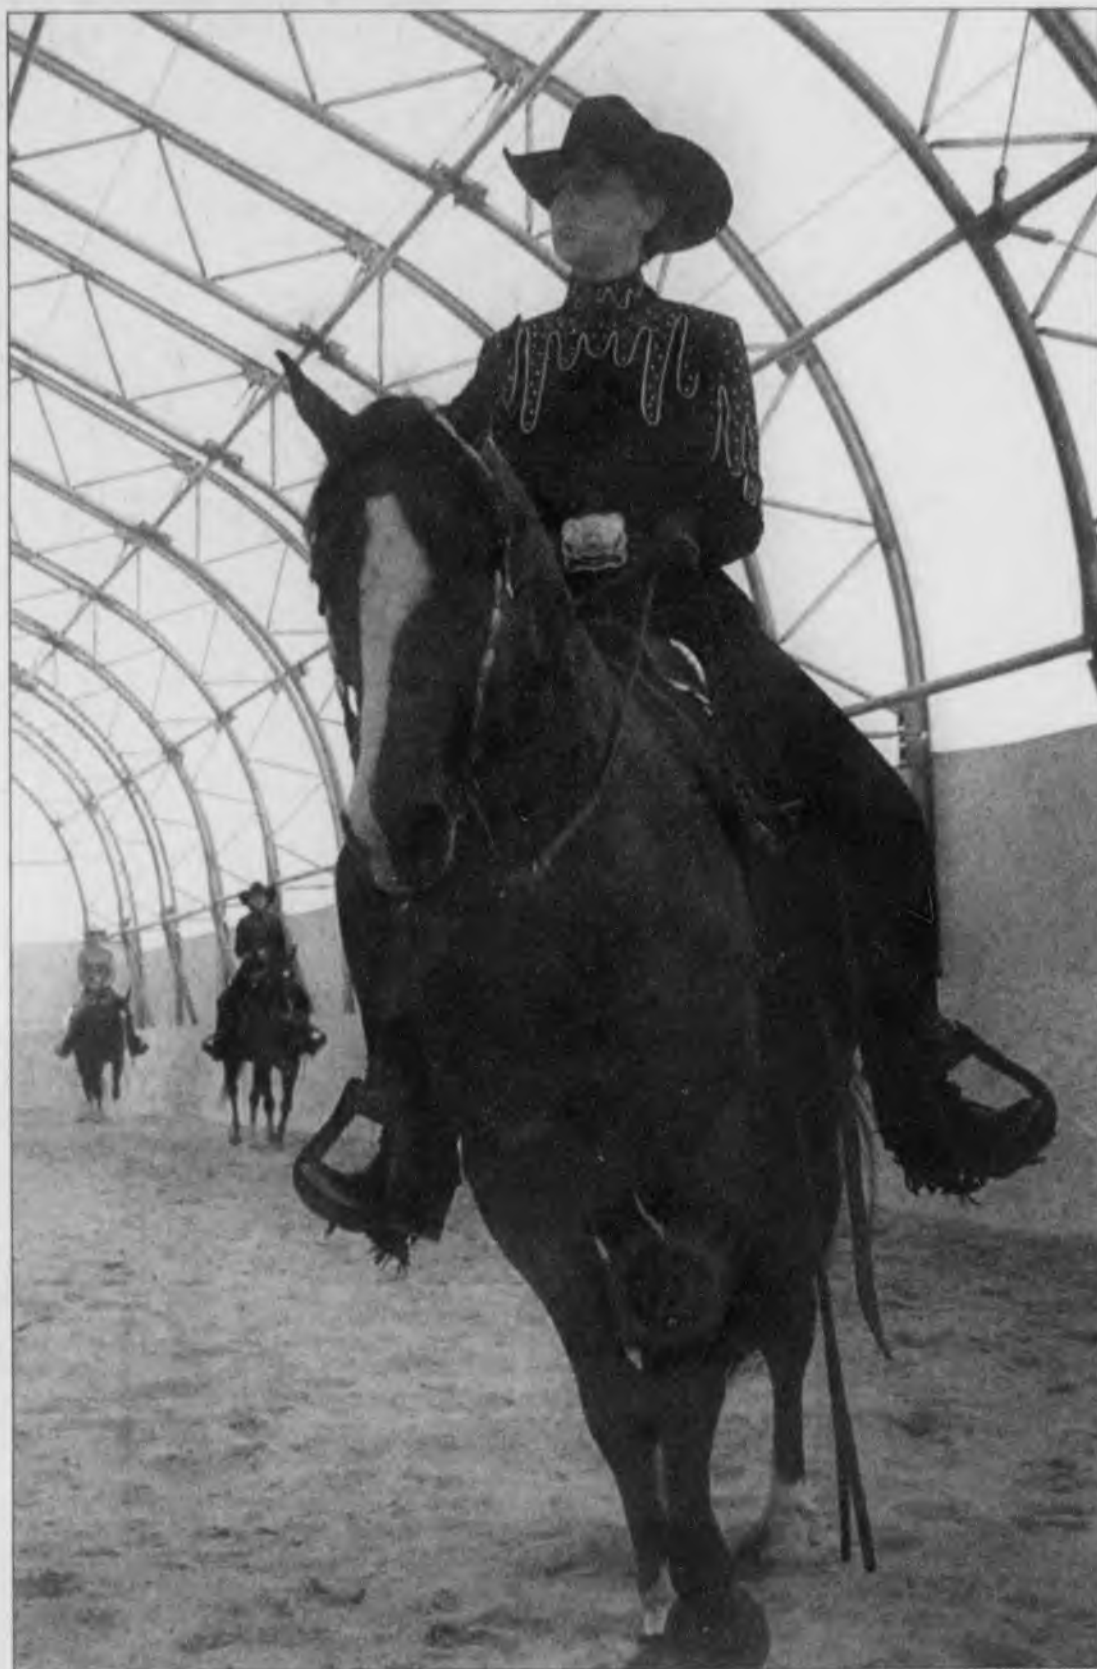

Sunday's play went much the same way.

The Cats grabbed first place again, finishing with 29 points, nine ahead of reserve high-point finisher West Texas A&M. Texas A&M finished with 17 points and Oklahoma State rounded out the field with 14.

K-State riders placed first in eight of the 11 classes, including Gratny's second-straight High-Point Rider honor, after finishing first in Reining and Horsemanship again.

"I rely on Kelly for a lot," Briendenthal said. "She's one of my top riders, and she proved that this weekend."

But Gratny wasn't the only bright spot for the Wildcats. K-State dominated competition Sunday, collecting wins in all classes of Intermediate, Advanced and Beginner Horsemanship and posting top-six finishes in all but one event, something Pike said shows a positive future for the program.

Photos by Nicole Donnert/Collegian

Senior co-captain Kelly Gratny competes in the Open Horsemanship competition last weekend during K-State's first-ever home event. Gratny earned high-point honors on both Saturday and Sunday by winning both the reining and horsemanship events.

"First year, you're a little uncertain, but we've definitely proven that we got the right girls during the tryout process and that they can compete."

With their first home event now in the books, the Cats now shift their focus to preparing for the rest of the season.

"It was great for K-State," Pike said. "We got home advantage, and we were able to show that we can compete for a national championship. It's what we needed after getting off to a slow start last year."

The K-State Western team will next see action Nov. 10-11 with two shows in College Station, Texas. The English team begins the fall season Nov. 17-18 at West Texas A&M.

Loyalty not big concern in sports

Fair-weather fans always get a bad rap. Nowhere is it written — not in stone nor on a Nike shirt — that sports fans have to be true to their team even during turmoil. Granted, if you're not, you should burst into flames, but there's no law against it.

I've recently been prompted to objectively weigh the rationale of the fair-weather mind-set after Saturday's absurdity in Lubbock, Texas.

Joe Elkinton

Who the hell does Texas Tech think they are? It has to be a fluke. I mean, I don't even own a Tech T-shirt. Do they even sell them?

It's depressing me, really.

What am I even doing at this school? What is my reason for living? Should I call Miss Cleo?

The fall sports season has turned into a nightmare and forced me to consider my place in the cosmos.

I never study or go to class, so being a driven student is crossed off the list.

As a journalist (or pseudo-journalist), I could look back and reflect on my thoughts on the last quarter and discuss how I have grown. Well, let's see.

Over the last nine weeks as a sports columnist, all I can conclude is, I have the innate ability to piss people off, that I have gained 10 pounds and that ignorant people love to write hate e-mail.

So, let's think about my journey as a Wildcat fan.

The loss to Oklahoma pained me deeply. I wept and ate way too many burritos in sorrow.

Then the Texas Tech insanity kicked me in the groin, and I said, "What the hell, screw this. Bleeding purple only leaves me drained."

Is it really that 'evil' to stop rooting for a team when they start losing? It's not illogical.

In the past, I have mildly followed the football program for Oregon State, merely because my sister-in-law is a student there.

Then they got plowed by Fresno State, and I sighed. Ah, the WAC.

Surely, I thought, they can go on and defeat their conference rivals Arizona and Washington State. Nope and nope.

Now, sputtering with an overall record of 2-3, I fear a defeat is imminent Saturday against Arizona State, and frankly, I'm considering packing my bags and heading 50 miles south to cheer for the Oregon Ducks instead.

Sorry, State, but just because your mascot is the hallowed Beaver and you're 10th in The Associated Press poll doesn't keep you sexy in my book.

I always was a backseat fan of Colorado, ever since I lived there, and I always hoped they would get better. Then it happened. They had an awakening, found their dancing feet and kicked our ass. So, screw the Buffs now.

Just like my prior support of CU, my roots in the Rockies also had me tailgating for the Avalanche, but they had their spotlight and snagged the Stanley Cup, so I moved to my former team of Toronto.

That's right, as you feared, I now have switched gears to hockey. I watched the Maple Leaves rise and fall in their quest for carnage and glory, but they kept falling short, and I now am trying to support Canada as little as possible; besides, they're only scratching out a 2-2-1 record as of this columnist's deadline.

So, I switched to the Western Conference because it's just a different kind of hockey.

Now, for no reason except to get my jollies, I have decided to keep a tag on the Chicago Blackhawks. They're doing no better than Toronto, but the season still is young.

All in all, it makes a good chunk of sense to be a fair-weather fan because nobody likes to lose.

However shallow I might be, I am not a fair-weather enemy. I never will root for the Yankees or the Huskers or the St. Louis Blues, of that I can be sure. But my life as a fan is always changing.

You can root for your favorite sport's rag-tag squad if you must, saying to yourself, "Fight the good fight. We'll get 'em next time," but where's the excitement?

There is something to be said for superficial and petty, people.

If you dump on your team when they lose and you move on, you always can follow a winning team, keep the excitement felt only by victory and find the fastest route to a national or world championship.

Why waste all that time smearing on face paint just to cry it all off?

Everyone loves waving their foam finger and spilling their nachos in triumph, but to always be able to do so, you might need a map and a mini van.

Crew team shines in American Royal regatta

BY DAN SMITH
Kansas State Collegian

K-State's crew team found out just how important depth was at the American Royal Fall Rowing Classic in Kansas City, Mo., on Sunday.

The Wildcats placed first in the Varsity 8 plus race, despite the absence of Brandy Sherwood, K-State's top coxswain, with a time of 15:03, eighteen seconds before second-place Kansas.

"The varsity had a good race," head coach Jenny Hale said.

"The varsity coxswain was sick, so they were rowing with a novice coxswain but they still did a nice job. They got good power, and it was a really good regatta for them."

K-State's first-place finish was an improvement on the team's second-place showing at the Head of the Des Moines regatta Sept. 29.

The Cats' second varsity 8 boat finished in eighth place, with a time of 16:07.

K-State's Novice 8 boat finished second to the Oklahoma Area Rowing Club by 11 seconds in a race that Hale said probably should not have taken place.

"The novices did a good job," Hale said. "They had some challenges with the river being extremely low."

"They hit some rocks and broke some skags, and with the river so low, it is questionable as to whether or not the K-State's women's crew team competes in last year's Big 12 Invitational at Tuttle Creek on April 29. It was the Cats' first home regatta in over a year. K-State took first in last weekend's Varsity 8+ race at the American Royal Fall Rowing Classic in Kansas City, Mo. The Cats also did well in the novice race, finishing second behind the Oklahoma Area Rowing Club.

race should have been run," she said. "It was more challenging than it ought to have been for the novices."

Still, the novices didn't seem to have a problem navigating the course, even in the 4-boat. The Cats' Novice 4 also finished second, rowing to a 18:28 time and finishing just 21 seconds behind Oklahoma City University in the race.

"We had to pull one of our freshman recruits from the Novice 4+ race due to a back injury in the first race," Hale said.

"They did all right, but they definitely got a race under their belts. We'll just go back and get ready for the Head of the Iowa."

The K-State doubles boat led by Ingrid Shwaiko and Jill Anderson had an easy race, finishing with an 18:34 time, 32 seconds ahead of teammates Marja-Lisa Paulson and Courtney Franssen. The two teams were the only entries in doubles competition due to injuries on the other teams.

"We used this race to see who is moving the boat the fastest," Hale said.

"The girls in this race were a little inexperienced in the smaller boats, so it was a good chance for them to work with that type of boat."

K-State returns to action Saturday and Sunday in Boston, Mass., for the Head of the Charles.

LOCAL TALENT

Fran Albright, actress in "A New Brain"

Fran Albright, senior in theater, plays Mimi Schwinn, mother to Gordon Schwinn in the musical "A New Brain."

The musical opened last week and will continue to show at 8 tonight through Saturday in Nichols Theatre. Albright said she appreciates the message of "A New Brain" because it reminds people to live life to its fullest and enjoy every moment.

Since the age of seven, Albright said that she has been involved in theater, getting her start in community musicals in Manhattan during the summers. This is her second year participating in K-State theater, and she said she plans to continue studying theater as a graduate student.

"A New Brain" offers a different challenge because Albright never has played a character in Mother Schwinn's age range before, she said. The acting experience has become important to her, Albright said.

"I like it because it gives me a chance to explore life from different points of view," she said. "And if I'm lucky enough to get in a really well-written show, sometimes I'm able to share a lesson or feeling with the audience and offer a new perspective on life."

PAINTING THE FIELD

Paintball provides challenges, adrenaline rush

Story by Layton Ehmke ■ Photos by Jeanel Drake

ABOVE: Darrin Fulton, freshman in criminology, shoots his opponent during a game of paintball with other K-State students on Saturday.

BELOW: Dan Walker, senior in management information systems, and Galen Robertson, senior in mechanical engineering, run to take cover during a game of paintball with fellow K-State students Saturday.

A dozen adventurous K-Staters locked and loaded their paintball guns and headed out to hunt and pelt one another with paint last Saturday.

The Union Program Council's Adventures Committee sponsored the activity, which gave students the chance to battle it out on a paintball course west of Manhattan. Dan Walker, Adventures Committee member, said the paintball event, which is in its third year, went well for the participants.

"It was fun and good times," said Walker, sophomore in management information systems. "This is our third year doing paintball. There were no prizes. It was just a cheap day of fun."

The players participated in a variety of paintball-based games, such as speedball. It is a game based on agility in which players split into two teams and compete against the opposition on a small course. The team with the most players left standing wins.

Darren Fulton, freshman in criminology, says speedball is hard because the players must react quickly, move and get out of the way.

"I used 350 rounds and a whole tank of air in one game," he said. "And I took quite a few dings in speedball, too."

Other games, like Capture the Flag, require more planning than just running and reacting. The game played on a woodland course, in which one team defends its flag while it attempts to capture the other team's flag simultaneously. Fulton said the course was perfect for Capture the Flag because it's bigger than most and has more cover.

A third game the students played was Defend the Tower, in which one team attacks the other team's fort and attempts to take control of the tower by forcing the other team out. Defend the Tower is like Capture the Flag, but there is more cover for the team in the tower, Fulton said.

Walker said paintball is more exciting than other hobbies in which in which people might participate.

"Paintball gets your adrenaline pumping. It's a time to meet new people and spend the day outside," he said.

The games took place near Keats, Kan., about five miles west of Manhattan at Krazy Kris' Paintball Games. Owner Kris Backman said the course plays host to many different groups and private parties.

"We have a lot of fraternities, church youth group, and other student groups come out to play," he said. "Even the military comes out often to do exercises."

Backman said he has been playing paintball for 13 years, and anybody can get involved in the sport.

"Paintball is a great way to get the adrenaline pumping," he said. "Age and sex make no difference. I'm fifty-six years old. The kids may run a little faster, but I play smarter."

The fall day was perfect for paintball. Brad Henderson said, sophomore in management information systems.

"The day was beautiful. It was my first time, and I thought it was a blast," he said. "I couldn't believe how much fun it was."

Backman said fall and spring are good times to play paintball because you don't have to worry about heat and dehydration.

All players are required to wear protective gear and face masks when they are playing, and nobody was injured this weekend, Walker said. Veteran paintballers are allowed to use their own equipment.

Fulton said Backman requires players to wear face masks and that he wears multiple layers of clothing to protect from the paintballs, which fly at 250 feet per second.

People get into paintball because of the rush it provides, he said, and it is a rewarding experience.

"It will wear you out, and it is worth the pain," Fulton said. "The major rush is actually getting shot at. The hairs stand up on the back of my neck. It's not too bad, nothing I can't deal with."

Backman schedules private parties on Saturdays and walk-ins on Sundays he said anyone interested can call (785) 485-2670.

Additionally, UPC plans to offer other program, and the Adventures Committee is sponsoring other activities such as rock climbing, Konza Prairie walks, CPR and first-aid training. Students interested in getting involved in the UPC Adventures Committee can attend the meetings every Tuesday night at 7 p.m. in the UPC office on third floor of the Union. Jason Baldrich, committee chair, said.

Fulton said the games Saturday were well-natured, and players enjoyed the experience.

"There is nothing fake about this, and we've got the scars to prove it," he said. "I challenge any doubters to come out and pick up a gun and play. It's for anyone who wants to get out and go crazy for a day."

Food science program to focus on nutrition

BY ELIZABETH GRAHAM
Kansas State Collegian

K-State's Food Science Institute opened its doors last month to be a resource for faculty, students and professionals involved in food science. The institute brings together 32 faculty members from five colleges on campus and was approved in September.

Curtis Kastner, director of the institute, said the faculty has worked together to develop the proposal for approving the institute, and the planning has been in process for some time.

"They wanted the visibility, the capacity and the effectiveness of the food science program to be enhanced," Kastner said.

Externally, they want the institute to serve the entire food industry, the consumer, the scientific community and the regulatory agencies, he said.

Food science encompasses many areas, Kastner said. Emphasis will be placed on nutrition, functional foods, food safety and value-added or further processed food.

Undergraduate and graduate education programs will be a main emphasis as well.

The institute will be housed in Waters Hall for now. Kastner said they are in the process of getting furniture, and in the interim, they are working on publicity and setting up phones and computer systems.

Kastner said the goal of the program is to coordinate and facilitate faculty interest in food science across several departments rather than creating a new department.

The interdepartmental program will focus on the strengths of existing food programs and build on those strengths to develop new program emphases at K-State, Kastner said.

One of those strengths is the Distance Education program.

"We identified this as one of the initiatives that we need to start with because if we can enhance what we already do well through distance learning, then with respect to building visibility around the country, people will see the distance learning program," Kastner said.

Kelly Getty, assistant professor in the Food Science Institute, works with the distance learning portion of the institute.

Getty said her main responsibility is to work with faculty across various areas at both the undergraduate and graduate levels to help them understand how to administer courses from the distance level.

"I am working with food science faculty to bring their courses online, to update them as need be and to develop new courses that could be offered," Getty said.

Getty is putting course videos in CD format, course information into Powerpoint format and checking for accuracy with technical and scientific content.

Through Distance Education, students can obtain a bachelor's degree, master's degree or food science certificate by completing the necessary coursework, Getty said.

Masters students are required to complete a report and thesis. Getty said it is very similar to what students on campus can complete, Via Distance.

Students must be accepted through the regular graduate program at K-State.

The advantage is that students can complete their thesis research at the company they are working at, Getty said.

Kastner said the facilitative-coordinative philosophy of the institute works well, and while not everyone has adopted that philosophy, other institutes around the country use it.

"We take the expertise that we have and work in combination to coordinate that with other universities," he said.

The Food Science Institute is part of the National Alliance for Food Safety, which involves universities and the U.S. Department of Agriculture.

Kastner said there are advantages to having an institute office.

The institute will provide the identity for graduate and undergraduate students and faculty and make K-State more competitive for grants, Kastner said. It also will benefit students.

"I think we will be more competitive for students. If we are competitive for the best students, that really enhances the progressive impact," he said.

Kansas City officials seek funding to fight terrorism

BY AMY SHAFER
The Associated Press

KANSAS CITY, Kan. — Public safety officials need more money from the federal government to prepare for biological or chemical attack, they told congressional representatives Monday.

U.S. Reps. Dennis Moore, D-Kan., and Karen McCarthy, D-Mo., heard the request during a conference with emergency preparedness officials from the Kansas City metropolitan area.

Fire officials said already-tight local budgets can't handle any additional strain.

The issue is a national one, not a local one, and the federal government needs to foot the bill, said Kansas City Fire Department Chief Richard Dyer.

The metro area already has an emergency plan, said Michael Selves, the Johnson County Emergency Management director. But he said agencies in the area must integrate efforts to handle biological and chemical attacks into that plan.

Concerns about biological and chemical terrorism have been raised since the Sept. 11 attacks in New York and Washington, D.C., that killed thousands.

Public safety officials said people need to know about what to watch for and what to do in the event of an attack.

Many who spoke at Monday's conference said they needed more funds for planning, training and equipment.

Ruth Schukman-Dakotas, director of safety administration for the University of Kansas Medical Center, said the hospital needs time to train staff and funding to train and protect the staff.

Kansas City Medical Director Dr. Matt Gratton said that while officials have a good plan for dealing with an emergency, hospitals would be rapidly overwhelmed if there were a biological or chemical attack.

Health officials need equipment, training on how to respond, better laboratory capabilities for testing, better integration between various agencies and municipalities and more sustained funding, rather than one-time grants, he said.

Moore said Congress would have to decide between cutting taxes to spur the economy or giving more money to public safety.

STRAW HOUSE

few inches. Since the wall is 24 inches thick, there is room for window seats on the inside.

One straw house takes about a year to build. Each house sells for about $249,000. That is about 5 to 8 percent more than a regular house, but the straw house will save money on energy. He said he primarily builds in Manhattan, but now is finishing a home in Lawrence, Kan.

Shane Hall, senior in human resource management, said the house also is ecologically sound.

"Rod specializes in erosion control," he said. "He makes sure the land is preserved. He makes sure that there isn't a lot of dirt loss and makes sure that there is native grass. If he damages the grass, he'll replant it."

The goal in building a straw house is to get the roof structure done by harvest.

These straw houses pass many tests with high marks, Harms said. Straw entombed in concrete will not combust. Solid bales entombed in concrete will not allow rodents.

"The house receives high marks, although the three little pigs will tell you otherwise," he said.

Senator receives anthrax-laced letter

BY ALAN FRAM
The Associated Press

WASHINGTON, D.C. — A letter sent to Senate Majority Leader Tom Daschle tested positive for anthrax Monday as the bioterrorism scare rattling the nation reached the halls of Congress.

The discovery of anthrax in Washington followed earlier instances in Florida, New York and Nevada in which at least 12 people were exposed to spores of the potentially deadly bacteria. Monday night, another case was announced in New York.

The 7-month-old child of an ABC News employee has tested positive for anthrax, ABC

News President David Westin said. The child is expected to recover. New York police commissioner Bernard Kerik said news agencies throughout the city were being inspected for anthrax contamination.

The piece of mail in Daschle's office, which contained a powdery substance, was dispatched to an Army medical research facility at Fort Detrick, Md., for further examination.

Capitol Police Lt. Dan Nichols said. The Fort Detrick findings could be available as early as today, officials said.

Nichols and others warned that the initial tests were not necessarily accurate.

Bush told reporters there might be some link between the spate of anthrax incidents across the country and Osama bin Laden, who administration officials say was behind the Sept. 11 airline hijack attacks.

Daschle was in the Capitol and was not exposed to the letter, which was opened in his other office a block away in the Hart Senate Office Building.

Officials would not identify the person who opened the letter, though Nichols referred to the aide as a female. Aides who might have been exposed to the letter were tested with nasal swabs and are being treated with the antibiotic Cipro as a precaution, said Dr. John Eisold, attending physician in the Capitol.

AMERICA RESPONDS

U.S. planes strike Kabul
warehousesBY ROBERT BURNS
The Associated Press

WASHINGTON, D.C. — Intensified U.S. airstrikes have eviscerated the Taliban's combat power and placed it in imminent danger of losing a key northern stronghold, a senior Pentagon official said Tuesday.

The Pentagon also acknowledged that U.S. bombs accidentally hit warehouses in Kabul used by the International Committee of the Red Cross. A Navy F/A-18 Hornet dropped 1,000-pound bombs on the warehouses, the statement said.

A Pentagon statement released Tuesday night said the Red Cross buildings were among a series of warehouses targeted because U.S. forces believed the Taliban was using them to store equipment and military vehicles had been seen nearby.

"U.S. forces did not know that ICRC was using one or more of the warehouses," the statement said.

Red Cross officials have protested the bombing and said the warehouses, holding wheat, blankets and shelter materials, had the organization's symbol painted on their roofs. The Pentagon statement said the U.S. military regrets any innocent casualties and tries hard to strike only military targets.

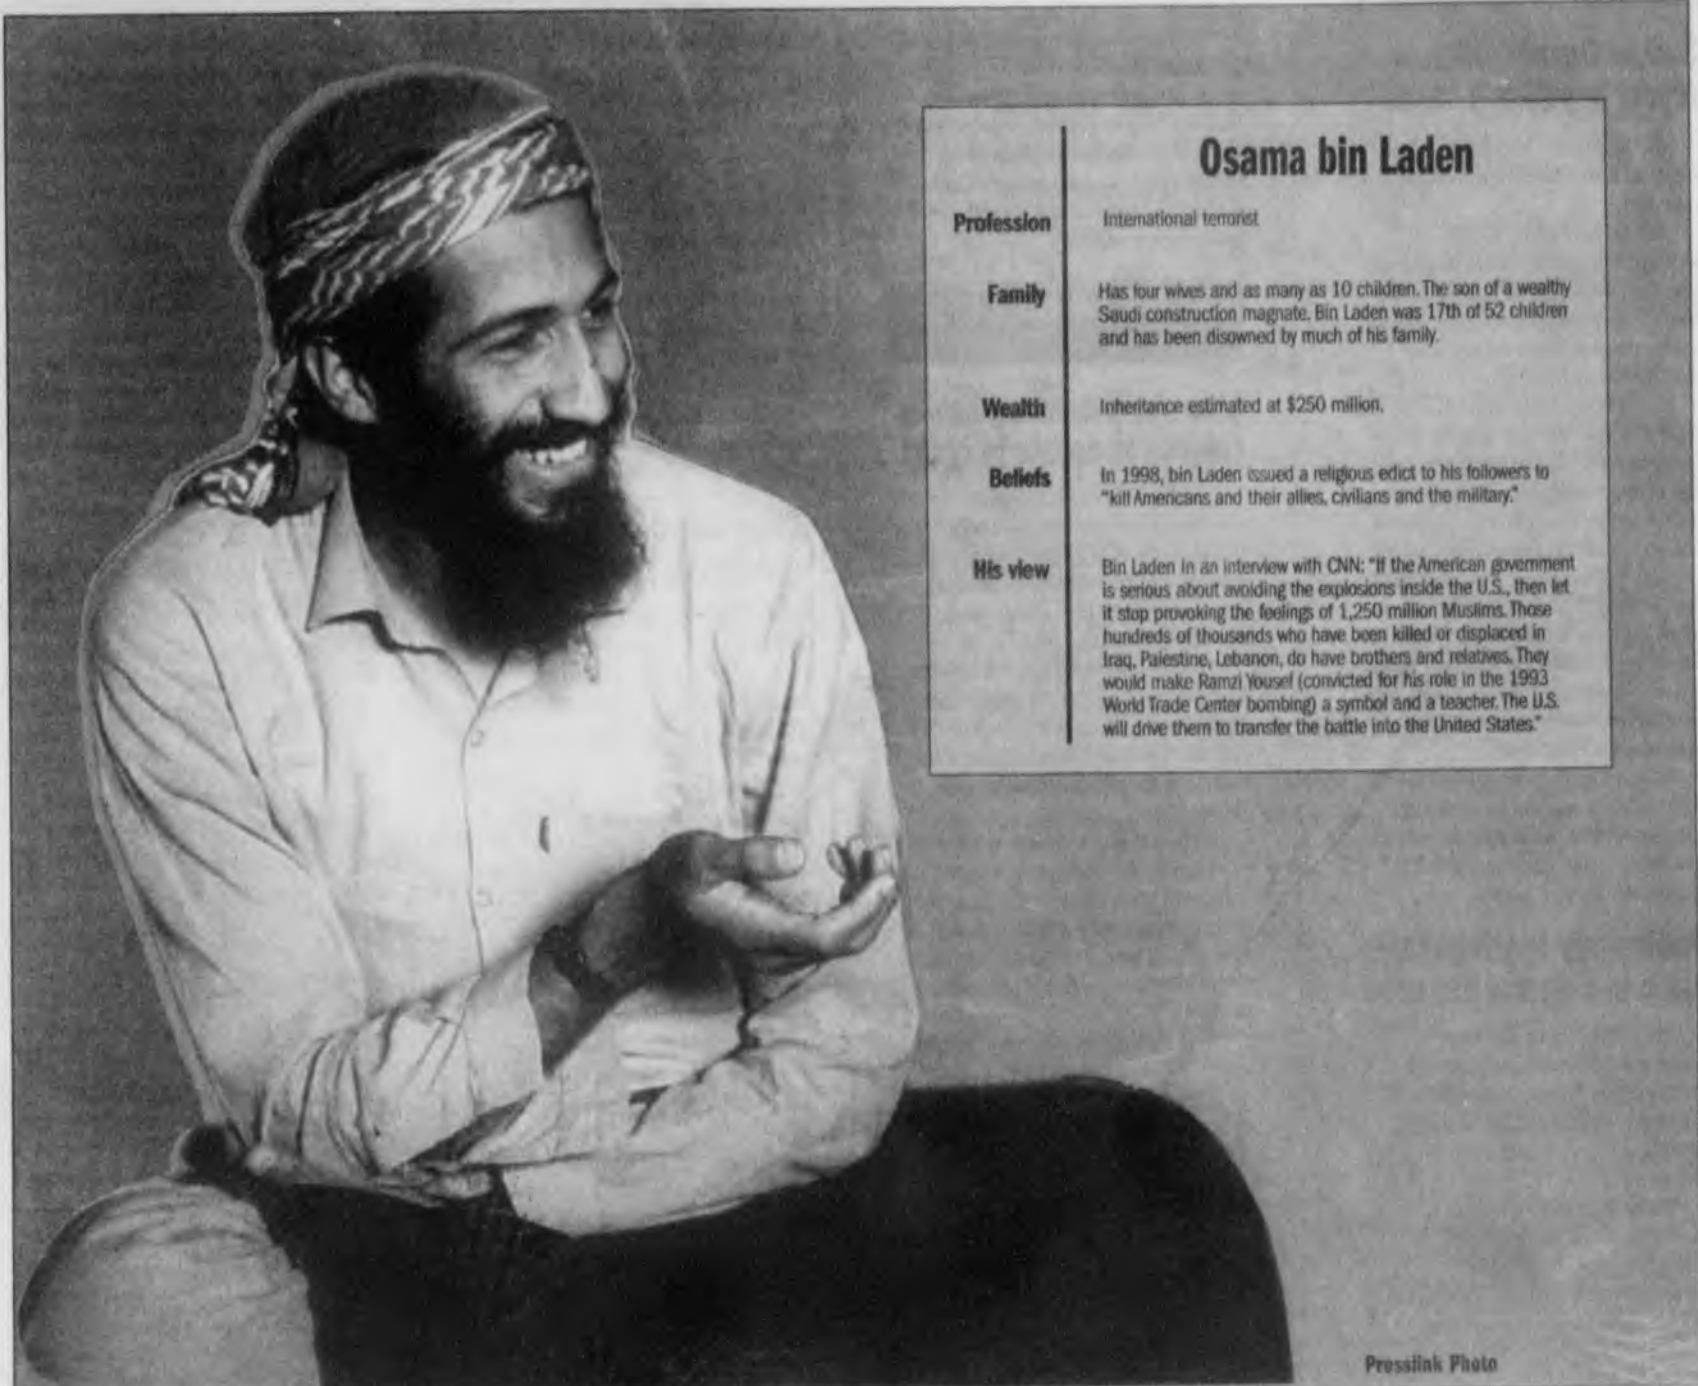

Marine Corps Lt. Gen. Gregory Newbold, director of operations for the Joint Chiefs of Staff, confirmed that Monday's strikes — by far the heaviest since the aerial bombardment began Oct. 7 — included the first use of the Air Force's AC-130 Spectre gunship, a low-flying special operations aircraft.

Newbold said two AC-130s were used, but he offered no details, including their targets. Another defense official, speaking on condition of anonymity, said they were used against a Taliban military barracks and headquarters building in Kandahar, the Taliban's seat of power in southern Afghanistan.

Yet another defense official said the AC-130 was set to fly again Tuesday, but he had no information on the outcome.

Speaking at a Pentagon news conference, Newbold said U.S. warplanes bombed a variety of military targets Monday, including armored vehicles at a training facility near Kandahar, surface-to-air missile emplacements defending the Kandahar airport and a tank near an

Osama bin Laden

Profession	International terrorist
Family	Has four wives and as many as 10 children. The son of a wealthy Saudi construction magnate. Bin Laden was 17th of 52 children and has been disowned by much of his family.
Wealth	Inheritance estimated at $250 million.
Beliefs	In 1998, bin Laden issued a religious edict to his followers to "kill Americans and their allies, civilians and the military."
His view	Bin Laden in an interview with CNN: "If the American government is serious about avoiding the explosions inside the U.S., then let it stop provoking the feelings of 1,250 million Muslims. Those hundreds of thousands who have been killed or displaced in Iraq, Palestine, Lebanon, do have brothers and relatives. They would make Ramzi Yousef (convicted for his role in the 1993 World Trade Center bombing) a symbol and a teacher. The U.S. will drive them to transfer the battle into the United States."

Bin Laden rises to create terrorist network

BY SARAH BAHARI

The threats were taken seriously. U.S. troops will leave Saudi Arabia when Islamic terrorists "send the bodies of American troops and civilians home in wooden boxes and coffins," Osama bin Laden said in an August interview with ABC News.

"We don't differentiate between those dressed in military uniforms and civilians," he added.

The State department warned all Americans traveling in the Middle East to be cautious.

On another occasion in February 1998, bin Laden said, "the ruling to kill the Americans and their allies — civilians and military — is an individual duty for every Muslim who can do it in any country in which it is possible to do it, in order to liberate the al-Aqsa Mosque and the holy mosque from their grip, and in order for their armies to move out of all the lands of Islam, defeated and unable to threaten any Muslim."

Bin Laden, the prime suspect in the terrorist attacks on the World Trade Center and the Pentagon, repeatedly has vowed to kill Americans. Still, no one could fathom the execution of the deadliest terrorist attack ever committed on U.S. soil. As fingers immediately pointed to bin Laden, rumors of his wealth, his power and his hatred for western civilization circulated.

But several questions remained.

Bin Laden's rise to power

Born in 1957 to one of Saudi Arabia's wealthiest construction magnates, sources reported bin Laden was an ordinary young man. His intense religious beliefs did not begin until his family's involvement in the rebuilding of the holy mosques of Mecca and Meddina.

In the 1980s, bin Laden joined many other young Saudi men to fight in Afghanistan against the invading Soviet Union — an operation the United States helped to fund.

When the fighting subsided in 1989, bin Laden emerged as the leader of an organization of veterans and religious fundamentalists who opposed non-Islamic governments. The group was called al-Qaeda, Arabic for "The Base."

Al-Qaeda quickly developed strong anti-

American sentiment. U.S. involvement in the Persian Gulf conflict only angered the group more. And when the United States continued its presence in Saudi after the war, bin Laden and other Muslims viewed it as an affront to their religion.

After the war, bin Laden moved back to Saudi Arabia to work for his family's business.

But in 1991, the Saudi government exiled bin Laden for his support of terrorist groups and his opposition to the reigning Saudi monarchy, the Fahd family. So, he moved to Sudan, where he invested millions of dollars and offered jobs to the country's poor citizens. In 1996, Sudan, under pressure to expel known terrorists, also exiled bin Laden.

He then took refuge in Afghanistan, where U.S. officials believe him to be today.

Quality, quantity of student housing questionable in future

Future of off-campus residences uncertain, rental inspections still possibility.

BY ALYSON RALETZ
Kansas State Collegian

Spending $265 a month, Taylor Tedder, junior in biology, pays rent to live in a house where bricks are falling out of the walls. He shares his home with three other students who all have tried to fix up the house, but Tedder said there is only so much they can do.

"When we moved in, the previous tenants had left the house really dirty," he said. "It's tough to keep clean when it is already in this bad of shape."

He said the worst part of the house is in its basement with the decaying walls and missing bricks.

"One good thing is, our landlord paid us to clean the house," he said. "He knows the house is older, and he knows it is beyond help. He appreciates anything we can do to clean it up."

Danielle Froelich, sophomore in pre-health, pays $265 a month to live in a house where her landlord recently has built a fence, created more off-street parking, renovated the bedrooms and installed a new linoleum kitchen floor.

Since the house has been kept up, she said she does not mind living in the older house.

"I am very satisfied with our house because if something went wrong, I know our landlord would fix it right away," Froelich said.

There is a range of off-campus housing available for students in Manhattan. Even though there are students living in newer apartment complexes and super duplexes, many still live in older Manhattan housing.

The state of off-campus housing during the next 20 years is unknown. There could be an increase or decrease in its quality and quantity. Students also could find themselves living in different neighborhoods than those of 2001. The city's long-range plans might include or exclude a mandatory rental inspection program.

Will there be a higher quality housing?

Calvin Emig, owner of Wildcat Property Management, said there is a lot of high-quality housing available in Manhattan, but there is some that is questionable.

"You see a lot of problems with the basement apartments with moisture getting

Jardine complex plans for extensive renovationsBY ALYSON RALETZ
Kansas State Collegian

Instead of moving out of the residence halls and into an off-campus house or apartment, students might be more attracted to the Jardine Terrace Apartment complex 10 years from now.

The complex includes Jardine, aimed at family living, William's Place, geared for single graduate students, and Wiley Apartments, intended for single undergraduates.

The Department of Housing and Dining Services is re-evaluating the complex and is considering a complete overhaul to create alternative on-campus living conditions in the future.

"We are thinking of repackaging the area," said Charles Werring, director of Housing and Dining Services. "Those are old, post-war buildings and we would like to see newer apartments and perhaps townhouses put in.

"We are at the very infantile stages of this plan, though. Right now, we are just talking about the years ahead."

Werring said Housing and Dining Services is not considering building any high-rise apartments for students in that area because the students who live in the complex choose it because they enjoy the privacy it offers.

Townhouses with multiple bedrooms would serve families with children better and meet the privacy needs of more clientele, he said.

"I like to dream and see in my mind what I would like to see," he said. "I ask myself, 'If we could start all over again, what would we do?' Part of my dream is to see more pockets of neighborhoods with a real

Workshop teaches dining etiquette, dinner interview tips

Pat Pesci, instructor of hotel and restaurant management and dietetics, administers helpful etiquette tips to Shirley Williams, senior in print journalism, during Tuesday night's Etiquette Seminar in the Derby Dining Center. Prior sign-up was required to participate in the event, with the meals costing $5.25.

Kansas State Collegian

Students of all ages dressed up and entered Derby Dining Center prepared to learn while they ate.

Career and Employment Services played host to its annual Dining Etiquette Seminar on Tuesday with the help of Sprint, this year's corporate sponsor.

Pat Pesci, instructor of hotel and restaurant management and dietetics, led the event.

About 150 students made reservations to attend the event, with more on the waiting list. Some were required by classes to attend, and others attended to gain experience for future formal dining.

"We were required to come for Topics of Hospitality, a class that Mr. Pesci teaches," said Jill Mason, sophomore in hotel and restaurant management, said. "But I also wanted to learn more about the rules of formal dinners, so if I'm being interviewed for a job over lunch or dinner, I'll know what to do."

Graduate assistant Jessica Heller was in charge of putting on the seminar this year and said the seminar benefits college students. "It's really useful for college students today," she said. "More and more interviews are taking place over meals, and it's important to know at least the basic dining etiquette so you make a good impression."

After students were seated, Pesci roamed around the room and lectured over a headset about what to do when one enters a dining hall.

"No one is going to know you dropped it in the first place. And if you picked it up, where would you put it?"

Pat Pesci,
instructor of hotel and restaurant management and dietetics

"Do not sit down after entering a dining hall," Pesci said.

"Instead, stand behind your chair until you are certain that's where you want to sit."

Pesci said often people sit down and then are invited to another table. He said it isn't good etiquette to take a drink and move it to another table. Therefore, one shouldn't sit down until the person is sure he or she won't want to move.

Pesci went through step-by-step rules for using napkins and silverware. He also discussed which direction to pass food and dishes around the table and gave advice on what to do if someone runs into a problem.

"We want to maneuver around false steps," Pesci said.

"We want to make it appear to those you are dining with, that you didn't do anything wrong at all."

Going along with this idea, Pesci talked about what to do if one drops food or silverware on the floor.

"Let it lie," Pesci said.

"No one is going to know you dropped it in the first place. And if you picked it up, where would you put it?"

Pesci gave tips and answered questions throughout the meal, and students were asked to fill out evaluations after the seminar.

Students in attendance said they got more than just a meal out of the dining etiquette session.

"I felt it was a good way to prepare myself for future formal dinners," Russell Yarnell, sophomore in civil engineering, said. "I learned a lot about the general rules of dining etiquette."

Union Food Court thefts decrease due to preventative measures

BY KECIA N. SEYB
Kansas State Collegian

Union Food Court thefts decreased following preventative measures, officials said.

At the beginning of October, K-State Student Union officials implemented new rules to deter further thefts — the elimination of fast food bags and monitors to patrol the area — after Union losses reached as much as $100 in one day.

"There has been improvement — very much so," Eric Braun, director of dining services, said. "Employees are much more attuned, and everyone's awareness has been raised."

Last week, Union workers caught two individuals who were in the process of not paying. Braun said one was trying to sneak out of the Food Court without paying, and the other was trying to discard Taco Bell tickets.

Braun said many of the shortages occurred because of Burger King's and Taco Bell's ticket systems. The two individuals who were caught paid what they owed.

"The matter was solved quietly, and that's how we want to handle it," Braun said. "We will report it if we have to, but we'd rather handle it quietly and move on."

Bill Wisdom, a food court monitor and assistant director of the Union, said he has noticed a decrease in the thefts.

"It's real quiet," he said. "When people know what you're doing, they don't do it. I don't want to catch anybody, but I will."

Braun said he is very encouraged by the results of the preventative measures so far. A spot check at Burger King and Taco Bell last week seemed promising, he said, and he will know more after another audit this week. He said he wants to follow through with the measures for a full 30 days before deciding whether to continue with them.

Besides having to sack their food at the cash registers, some customers also have had to open the lids of their food containers so workers could ascertain what was inside.

"People complain about it a lot," said Courtney Smith, a food court cashier. "They're just like, 'It's ridiculous. It's such a pain in the butt,' or they make jokes. 'You wanna check my tray?'"

Smith, sophomore in secondary education, said the complaints don't bother her. She said if there is a mark on the lid of the container, she doesn't have to check it, but if it's an unmarked box, she has to ask the customer to open it.

Braun said that so far, the measures are working, and he has been pleased with Union workers' and customers' cooperation.

"Several thousand people come through the Union Food Court every day, and only a few have complained, so we feel that's a real good percentage," he said. "It's difficult to please everyone all the time."

Elizabeth Ratcliff, junior in psychology, who eats in the Union often, said although the extra measures are a pain, they probably were necessary.

"I think they didn't really have a choice," she said. "I think it's too bad the actions of a few make us all have to pay for it."

LAUGHABLE LAWS

Legislation mocked by strange, unrealistic rules from past

As a student of government, I've often wondered how reasonably intelligent human beings can make such gross mistakes when creating laws. However, I feel it is my humble duty to show lawmakers the error of their ways and expose their absurd laws.

My crusade against deficient legislation takes a comical twist this week. This column examines some peculiar laws that still exist in our world today.

Disclaimer: The following are taken from the Web site dumbblaws.com. Some of them might appear silly, outdated or just plain ridiculous. Deep reflection on these laws can cause massive brain damage. Women who are pregnant should consult their physician before proceeding.

What better place to begin our analysis than in our state? Apparently, Kansas fishermen need strict regulations. Not only is it illegal for them to catch fish with their bare hands, but they're also prohibited from shooting rabbits from their boats. Not deer, not pheasants — just rabbits. Squirrels, beware — I'm getting my boat out this summer.

There is another law that might make you cross-eyed if you think about it too much. Did you know that if two trains meet on the same track in Kansas, neither shall proceed until the other has passed? Can anyone explain to me how to suspend laws of physics to implement this law?

I know what you're thinking. If a state like Kansas has laws like this, there must be all kinds of absurd laws in states like Arkansas, Nebraska and California. You're right.

Section 1-4-105 in Arkansas state law dictates the proper pronunciation of the state name. That's right, they actually decided to legislate that it is Ar-kan-saw, not Ar-kan-sas.

You might think I'm picking on Arkansas because of its reputation for being a little bit backward. Before you call the Fourum to complain, consider this law — a man legally can beat his wife, but only once a month. I rest my case.

And now for our favorite state — Nebraska. Planning on doing some whale fishing? Well, don't try to do it in this land-locked state because it's illegal. Do you have unruly children? If you do, avoid churches in Nebraska at all costs. If a child burps in a Nebraska church, parents can be arrested.

California — the state where sunshine is guaranteed to the masses, literally. There is a law that says just that. Another law prohibits animals from mating publicly within 1,500 feet of a tavern, school or place of worship. Pity to the pet owner who gets booked under this law. I wonder if they'll place this criminal's name and crime next to all the other incidents in the newspaper's police reports.

Of course, stupid laws don't end at our nation's borders. Let's take a look at some interesting legislation of other countries.

In Australia, a life sentence really isn't a life sentence. It's actually only 25 years. Also, in Australia, children can't get arrested for smoking cigarettes, but they can for attempting to purchase cigarettes.

Canadians are not permitted to remove their Band-Aids in public and cannot pay for 50-cent items with only pennies. I guess when you think about it, these laws aren't so silly. Whoever said Canadians weren't sensible?

Transvestites should steer away from Italy when touring Europe. A man can be arrested for wearing a skirt there.

Though many citizens and law enforcement agencies ignore these laws, I'm still going to try to get some of them repealed. Civil disobedience will be my weapon of choice. If anyone wants to join me, I'm in the process of organizing a whaling trip to Nebraska.

Safety issues in student housing need attention

Locally, we are dealing with complex housing issues with no quick solution. Will there be a shortage in the future? Will housing standards improve? No one can seem to answer that question at this point.

Last year, there was a dialogue between the city and the university discussing what should be done to make housing safer for students. Unfortunately, that conversation ended.

Ockert Fourie, senior city planner, said the high amount of adversity posed by renters at the meetings made the direction of rental inspections hard to focus.

A year later, things have not changed. Every block seems to have at least one questionable structure students inhabit.

The future of housing is not something we can ignore much longer. Students and, more specifically, student government need to bring up the conversation and voice the concerns of housing again.

If the university plans on growing much more, it really needs to consider where it will put these extra students.

If you are concerned about the safety of your dwelling, call the Fire Department, Code Services and set up an appointment to have your dwelling inspected.

The inspectors will come out to your house and make sure your place is safe. If it isn't, your landlord will be notified.

We need to get the conversation about safe housing started again with the city and the university each taking responsibility.

Let's make the future of housing certain and safe.

Suing mistress over adultery unfair

Do you remember the woman who sued McDonald's because her coffee burned her? I didn't think lawsuits could be more outrageous than that.

That is, until I read an article in the October issue of Marie Claire titled, "I sued the woman who stole my husband."

Candi Wagner took her husband's mistress to court and won $500,000. Due to laws in her state, she could not sue her husband for having an affair. The bottom line is, she should not have sued anyone.

She should have put the blame where it belonged — on her husband.

In the article, Candi explains how she fell in love with Gary. They had three children and seemingly the perfect family.

Then Prince Charming turned into a toad, make that a horny toad.

He started having an affair. When Candi found out and confronted him, he said he loved his mistress and asked for a divorce.

Candi wrote, "I believed that Gary's change of heart had little to do with me and everything to do with the woman who had seduced him."

It is appropriate that she doesn't blame herself for her husband's infidelity, but the second part of her sentence was, and remains, incorrect.

The other woman had no commitment to Candi. She had not been the one to stand before family, friends and God to acknowledge their sacred union on their wedding day. She had not been the one to create a family with Candi.

It was Gary who did all of those things.

He also was the one who took and ignored their commitment.

Gary was not forced to take off his pants. He was not forced to have sex with another woman.

I have been cheated on before, so I know how easy it is to blame the other woman. It is much easier to place the blame on a stranger than on someone you love.

It hurts like hell when someone you care for can cheat on you and still look you in the eye. It feels like someone has punched you in the stomach and let cockroaches invade your heart.

The easiest way to vent anger is to say it was someone else's fault, not your significant other's. It was someone else who caused your faithful companion to cheat.

However, the other person is not the problem (Unless he or she is a friend, then that is another situation all together).

The problem is an issue of respect, or the lack thereof. Gary did not have respect for his wife, for his family, for his mistress or even for himself. It showed with his actions. It showed with his decisions.

Candi said the mistress knew Gary was married and a family man. Obviously, Gary didn't remember. More importantly, he did not honor that commitment.

How someone could cheat with someone who is married is beyond me. But the mistress should not have been sued for alienation of affection.

Suing the third party for helping to break up a marriage is the basis of a law that still exists in many states in the United States.

This law, which began in the 1700s, exists in nine states. Kansas is not one of those. In North Carolina alone, 200 similar cases are filed annually.

The law should be changed.

Suing someone who was not in the relationship is nothing more than using him or her as a scapegoat.

The blame should be placed where it belongs — on the cheating forbidden fruit who spoiled the romance.

Constitution intended for all; individual interpretation key

Editor,

I am writing in response to Jennifer Palmer's obviously heartfelt letter in the Monday edition of the Collegian. She presented a few points that demonstrate an absence of a basic grasp of not only English, but of our country's own particular brand of democracy as well.

First and foremost, our country was founded on dissension between the people of this country and their rulers. To ask everyone in this country to forget that and to blindly accept/support our leaders is a dangerous request.

Much to Rush Limbaugh's dismay, we are not a country of automatons, walking lock step behind our leaders. To expect blind loyalty (i.e., calling other people who disagree with you unAmerican) does a great disservice to our founding fathers' profound vision for our great nation.

I am one of those members of the military she spoke of, and I have spent a good number of years on both sides of the business end of a rifle.

So I truly appreciate her support. However, I do not require it from all members of our society. I did not swear an oath to defend our Constitution because I expected everyone protected by this document to lavish me with praise whenever they see me. I did it for very personal reasons and feel that it is short-sighted to expect everyone else to have identical beliefs to my own.

How free are we to think and act if we also require everyone to support the establishment at all times? Who knows what the implications of this sort of thinking would have had on other events that took place in the early to mid-20th century? Did anyone else catch a whiff of McCarthyism after reading Monday's editorial page?

This reminds me of a story about President Dwight D. Eisenhower. Before he became president of our country, he was president of Columbia University. A visiting professor was very impressed with the extensive library on display in Eisenhower's office. That is, until he discovered that the several thousands of books on display were merely titles printed on material meant only to look like the books they represented.

Miss Palmer, do we want our constitutional rights to merely be a nice looking facade or to be something exercised and encouraged each and every day? I, for one, do not want to place these rights on a shelf, never to be used again, all in the name of one definition of "American."

Why does everyone keep picking on the word 'panties'? I love it.

To hell with all of this war business. I want to know what is up with Gary Condit.

Does anyone else think Monkey Boy is like a soap opera on acid?

This is a big hug for all of the football boys. I still love you.

First, the team was losing helmets. Then it was shoes. Now it is entire players.

I just have a question: Does it make me a bad person if you make out with three boys in a week?

I would like to comment on the person that said 'panties' is the most annoying word in the world. I have to agree, and I also think the word 'potty' should be outlawed.

To the shivering frat guys I saw today — summer is over, so put away your cargo shorts and Abercrombie visors.

The same bandwagon fans that got on in 1998 are the same ones who are getting off now.

I just read in the paper that Manhattan High is a 12-point favorite over K-State.

For those of you who have forgotten where the crosswalks are at — they are the little white lines running parallel to the road, and they are in a line going across the street.

For the person worried about not giving Afghanistan money — they are getting a $30 million fireworks show.

Even though the men's rowing team doesn't get scholarships, they can still win unlike a certain other team at K-State.

Speaker focuses on gender inequality in modern society

Drew Rose/Colegian

Dr. Allan G. Johnson, professor of sociology and women's studies at Hartford College for Women, speaks Tuesday afternoon about unraveling the gender knot. Johnson spoke as part of the 2001-02 Provost Lecture Series.

BY KATIE SUTTON
Kansas State Collegian

A woman working full time from age 25 to retirement at age 65 will earn roughly $500,000 less than a man during her lifetime, Allan Johnson said.

"Even after breaking the glass ceiling, men make roughly one-third more than women," Johnson said. "The higher you go up in education, the greater the income gap."

Johnson is a professor of sociology and women's studies at Hartford College for Women of the University of Hartford. He spoke to K-State students and faculty about dealing with gender issues and unraveling the gender knot.

The lecture, which was part of the Provost Lecture series, took place in Hale Library's Hemisphere Room Tuesday.

Johnson said the difficulty in discussing gender issues is the paralysis of society.

As a result, he said a pattern of male dominance is "acted out all over society all the time with a consequence of advantages to men at the expense of women."

Johnson said society follows a path of least resistance on which it chooses the easiest path. For example, Johnson said, when a sexist or racist joke is told, the easiest response is silence.

"We are constantly navigating through social situations," he said. "We are the ones who make social systems happen, and all the consequences come out of human beings' decisions to participate in social systems."

Johnson said patriarchy is the system that influences the world to perpetuate gender inequality in the workplace and in society. He examined language to illustrate that a patriarchal society is not only male-dominated but male-identified, meaning men are used as a standard for all of society.

Johnson said words like 'mankind,' 'manpower' and general male pronouns support a positive image of males, whereas language such as 'whipped' or 'henpecked' is used to subordinate women. He then asked the audience for a word applied to a "henpecked" woman.

"There is no such word," he said.

"Patriarchy is used to support and promote male superiority. That's what this is all about."

Lesley Wright, freshman in electrical engineering, said she disagreed that patriarchy was used to keep women oppressed.

"I don't think our generation has a lot of these problems," Wright said.

"I agree with the words being male-oriented, but I don't really see overall that our generation is male-dominated. I sort of think it's the opposite."

Johnson said gender inequality still is prominent, even in the beginning of a new century. He said the start to unraveling the gender knot is to change the way the world is perceived and how people view their positions within it. However, Johnson said the solution to patriarchy cannot be reached without a struggle.

"We have to overcome the illusion that there are nice ways to change," he said.

"It is not possible to influence, to encourage people with privilege to give it up without making anybody uncomfortable. I don't think that's possible."

Ashcroft: Potential anthrax scares will result in prosecution

BY KAREN GULLO
The Associated Press

WASHINGTON, D.C. — Assailing recent anthrax hoaxes as no joking matter, Attorney General John Ashcroft said Tuesday those who perpetrate anthrax or other terrorist scares will be prosecuted.

With the FBI chasing down thousands of reports of possible anthrax exposures — most turn out to be false alarms or practical jokes — Ashcroft said such scares are unlawful and gross transgressions of the public trust.

The warning came as suspicious letters, unmarked packages and nonstop hoaxes have spread anthrax anxiety around the globe. No anthrax cases have been confirmed outside the United States.

With FBI Director Robert Mueller at his side, Ashcroft said a rash of hoaxes across the country have taxed the resources of an already burdened law enforcement system.

An FBI warning last week about possible terrorist attacks within the next few days still is in effect, so authorities cannot afford to be diverted by phony scares.

He detailed the prosecution of a Connecticut state employee who sat by quietly as a state agency building was evacuated for what the man allegedly knew to be a false threat involving white powder.

It is a federal crime to threaten to use biological agents or toxins to harm people.

Joseph A. Faryniarz, an employee of Connecticut's environmental agency, told agency security guards Oct. 11 that he found a powdery substance on a paper towel under some paperwork near his computer.

Security officials alerted the police, and all 800 agency employees were evacuated. Twelve employees were forced to disrobe and be washed down with a decontamination solution, Ashcroft said.

Faryniarz told FBI agents he thought two colleagues might be involved but later acknowledged that he lied. He said he knew the incident was a hoax even before the FBI arrived because another individual not named in the complaint had claimed responsibility. The two-day evacuation of the building cost taxpayers $1.5 million, Ashcroft said.

Faryniarz was charged with making false statements to FBI agents. He was not charged with perpetrating the hoax. He could face a maximum of up to five years in prison and a fine of up to $3 million — twice the loss incurred as a result of the scare.

Others face state or federal charges in connection with hoaxes around the country.

—A Cincinnati man who said he left an envelope containing a white powder on his boss' desk as a practical joke has been charged with inducing panic.

—Police in Fairfield, Conn., traced a call threatening biological attacks against several courthouses to Fred Forcellina, who was charged with threatening to use a weapon of mass destruction against people.

—A Colorado man accused of leaving an envelope of white powder for co-workers at an apartment complex was arrested Monday after he said he did it as a joke. The powder was laundry detergent, police said.

Fears of anthrax contamination also have produced false alarms in other countries.

An Israeli newspaper executive opened an envelope Tuesday filled with white powder and a note reading, "Regards from Afghanistan." In Australia, anthrax jitters emptied buildings nationwide and prompted calls for a crackdown on hoaxes.

In the United States, the FBI has received more than 2,300 reports of incidents or suspected incidents involving anthrax since Oct. 1. Most of them have been false alarms or practical jokes, Mueller said.

But agents treat every report as potentially the real thing, he said.

The FBI has not ruled out the possibility that anthrax exposures around the country are the result of terrorism although no direct link has yet been found to any terror groups, including the suspected hijackers responsible for the Sept. 11 attacks, he said.

ROAD TEST

Cats look to gain win at Oklahoma

BY SEAN PURCELL
Kansas State Collegian

K-State volleyball will return to action Friday in hopes of getting a victory to begin the second half of its Big 12 season.

It also will be important for the Cats (10-5, 6-3) to prove they can be a force on the road as they take on the University of Oklahoma (2-15, 1-6) this weekend in Norman, Okla.

With only one win on the road this season, head coach Suzie Fritz said it will be important to get a victory over the Sooners.

"We haven't played well as a team on the road yet," she said. "It has come down to a combination of not mentally and emotionally preparing for these matches. And as a staff, we need to prepare the team better."

But before the Sooners, the Cats will use a much needed open date in the schedule to iron out the wrinkles and prepare for tough upcoming matches, Fritz said.

With no game scheduled for Wednesday, the extra practice will give the team a chance to specify more on the aspects of its game that are giving team members trouble.

"We need to establish and work on the little things that will make this team better," Fritz said. "I feel when we are running on all cylinders we can play with anyone, and hopefully this week will allow us to recover and become a better volleyball team."

Junior Jenny Pollard said that this week will fuel the team for matches to come. After the Sooners, K-State will play three more times in a 10-day period. The Cats will trek to Texas A&M, then take on Texas Tech at Ahearn Field House before Nebraska on Oct. 27.

"It is important for us to maintain the mentality of taking it one game at a time," Pollard said. "These matches will be a good test, but I know we are capable of going out there and executing."

K-State showed those signs of improvement against a tough Baylor team, Fritz said. In the match, the Cats started off strong by taking the first two games. Baylor then roared back to force a game five, but Fritz said her team showed the character in that match that needs to be shown down the road.

"We played maybe the best volleyball we've played all year in game one," she said. "I like the way we are playing defensively because it creates opportunities for us to score points."

Each point this year has shown its bearing on the outcome of a match. The new rally-scoring format has put that premium on making the least amount of errors.

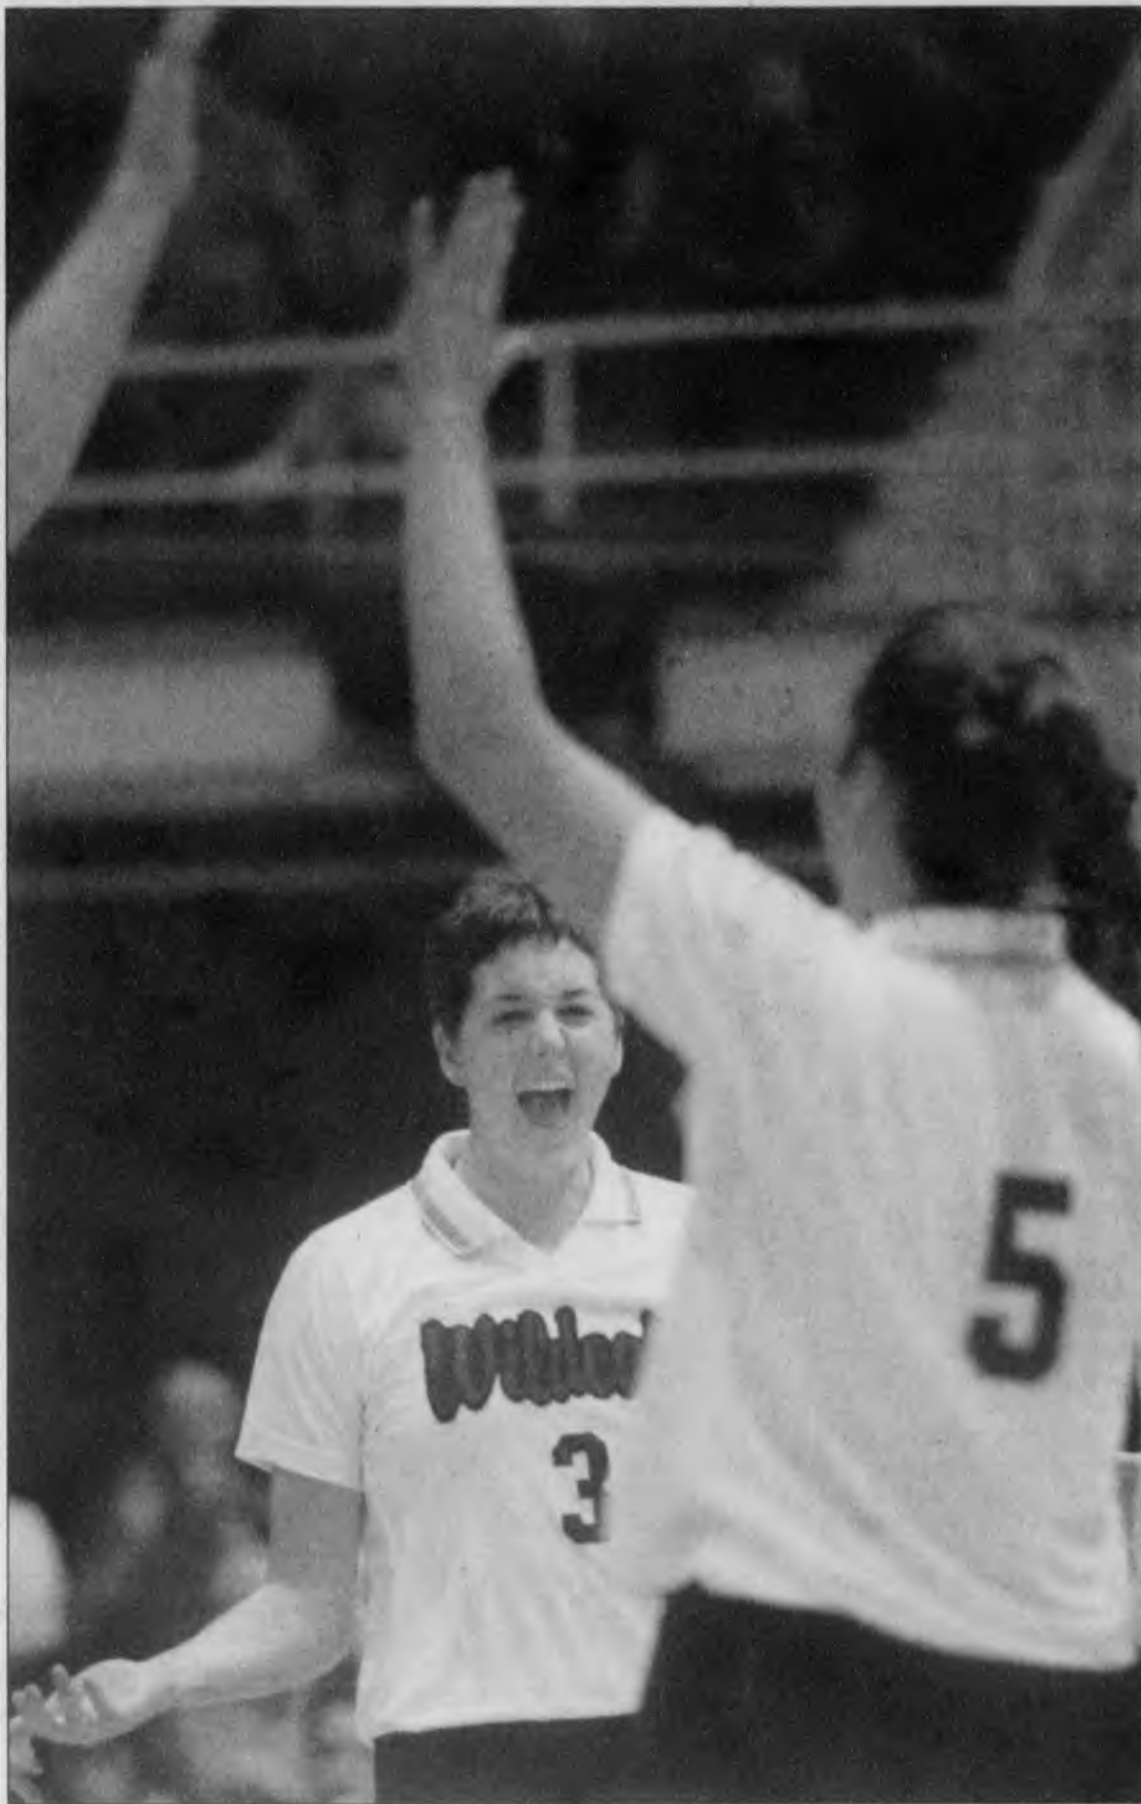

"Everything is a point, and it is so critical that we work on making less errors and siding out with them," freshman Gabby Guerre said. "Those are the keys to winning close matches."

K-State is no stranger to emotional matches, either. In addition to the five-set win against Baylor, the Cats also won a thriller against Missouri in late September.

Guerre said playing with high emotion is key when the team takes on several tough opponents in the next few days.

"It's very important to play consistent because we will be so emotionally drained," she said. "The matches, are so fast-paced, so it will be a priority for us to be emotional in every game."

"Our philosophy is that we have to continue to get better every day," she said. "It isn't the great plays that win matches but the good plays over time that make the team successful."

Lauren Goehring celebrates after K-State scores a point during the first game against Oklahoma earlier this season.

Gratny looking for higher jumps

BY BEN FEHR
Kansas State Collegian

Results. Senior co-captain Kelly Gratny took home high-point honors in both days of the first-ever home event for K-State's equestrian team Saturday and Sunday at Fox Creek Stables and finished as the overall high-point rider.

Gratny is used to getting strong results. As a junior in the 1999-2000 season, the Wildcats' first campaign as a varsity sport, Gratny brought home a regional championship in Open Horsemanship and lost a tie-break for the national title in the same category.

In 2000-01, Gratny qualified for nationals in Open Horsemanship and Open Reining, this time finishing fourth in horsemanship against the best the nation has to offer.

Equestrian competition can be difficult to master due to the uncertainty of the quality of horse a rider might draw, but Gratny said a childhood spent around horses and showmanship has been invaluable to her success as a rider.

"I was fortunate in that my father was a horse trainer," Gratny said. "I have grown up showing horses and have been fortunate to be able to ride a number of different horses."

"Having a diverse riding background definitely helps you out in this sport since you are riding foreign, unknown horses all the time."

Gratny said a learning-intensive background was nice when K-State decided to adopt women's equestrian as a varsity sport in 1999.

"My experience with K-State has been nothing but positive," she said. "I was really excited when we got the club team going my freshman year."

"I was overjoyed when we ended up getting varsity status."

That tag elevated a fledgling club program into a university funded activity, lending the support of coaching salaries, facilities, and, perhaps most importantly, horses.

"It was quite a change going from 10 active members to having 140 girls try out and have a varsity squad of 52 members," she said.

"The transition went very smoothly, and we are very fortunate to have coaches, and horses to work on, and money to help pay for travel expenses."

Kelly Gratny, open class rider, competes Oct. 7 at West Texas A&M last year.

After the move to varsity, K-State experienced significant production, besting defending national champion Oklahoma State in the regional last season and sending three qualifiers to compete on the national stage.

Gratny was one of those three and will look to return to nationals at the culmination of this season. Success, Gratny said, can be difficult to achieve against the uncertainty of equestrian competition.

"It is difficult because so much of your performance depends on a completely unknown animal," she said.

"Course showing is a very humbling sport in that, one day you can be at the top of your game, win everything, and then the next day, nothing goes right, and you completely tank."

Success is something Gratny hopes to build on this season.

"I aspire, just like everybody else, to win that national championship," she said. "I lost an individual national championship in a tie breaker, so yes, I would love to win it this year. That would be wonderful."

To realize those aspirations, though,

Gratny will need to call on the tools she has used throughout her riding career. She will have to rely on her abilities and have confidence in her coaches and experience, she said.

Gratny said preparing for an event is nothing new but not something she takes for granted.

"I try to watch the horses," she said. "I try to figure out what a horse's strong and weak points are so when I go on to draw, I have some kind of idea about what I am up against. I think about what I need to do to make that perfect ride."

After starting strong out of the gates and finishing as the team's top rider at K-State's first show this season, Gratny said she realizes she is capable of significant achievements as an individual. The success of the team, however, is where her true focus lies.

"Anybody who is involved right now is so lucky to be a part of this," she said. "I just want to go out and do what I can to help the team every time I go out there."

"We are building the equestrian team and have a legitimate shot at a national title. We are going to be a top-notch team and a force to be reckoned with."

Snyder's squad, Chiefs need shot of inspiration

Anyone who has ever played sports at any level has heard some kind of speech about heart from a coach.

You know what I mean, one of those, "Yeah, our backs are against the wall against these guys. They might be a better team, but we're going to come out, bust some heads and win because we got the heart."

I never really understood this whole heart concept until I was done playing sports. When I played sports in high school and got that heart speech, I would think, "Yeah — heart."

Great. Now, which of my friend's parents are out of town and having a party after the game?" You know what that attitude got me? A numeral jacket (opposed to a letter jacket).

Two teams in serious need of one of those heart speeches are the Kansas City Chiefs and our K-State Wildcats.

The Chiefs are off to an uninspiring 1-4 start. They are the epitome of the old possum joke. They play dead at home and get killed on the road. An 0-3 start at Arrowhead Stadium is almost unthinkable.

What makes this team even more disappointing is the play of new (and much ballyhooed) QB Trent Green. His 66.9 quarterback rating isn't what KC fans had in mind when head coach Dick Vermeil showed up promising a fast break, wide-open attack like the one that one him a Super Bowl in St. Louis.

They need to get the ball to Priest Holmes as much as they can. He is the team's leading rusher and second leading receiver. He's on pace for a 1,000-yard season. The last time the Chiefs had a 1,000-yard rusher, Jared from the Subway commercials was fat.

Vermeil's got heart. Heck, he cries after every game. He can coach, too. He has taken two teams to the Super Bowl in different decades.

Vermeil's defense has played tough so far this year, but he needs to get Green to start making plays and showing some guts (a more football-friendly synonym for heart) on the field.

Our K-State football team continues to be an enigma. Giving up 38 points to Texas Tech is just mind-blowing. Tech QB Kliff Kingsbury torched the Cats for 409 yards against the Cats. This team just doesn't look like the team I have watched in my previous three years at this school.

As Kingsbury showed last week, the defense has more holes in it than the steam lines at Hale Library. Any time your top two tacklers are your safeties, you know someone isn't doing his job. One week after beating up Oklahoma quarterback

Nate Hybl, the pass rush has disappeared. The offense has shown it can score, averaging 27.2 points per game, but the team has averaged 0.0 conference wins this year.

In years past, players such as Michael Bishop, David Allen, Jeff Kelly and Mark Simoneau have made the big plays when the Cats have been on the ropes.

The difference is, no one has stepped up this year.

Forget the Big 12 Championship game — the Cats are going to have to rally to get into a bowl game. Six wins make a team bowl eligible, but don't guarantee anything. Not all hope should be lost, though. Seven Big 12 teams made bowl appearances a year ago.

This weekend's game against A&M takes on even more significance given the possibility of an 0-4 start going into next week's game against KU. The Aggies have beaten the Cats twice in the last three years, including the Big 12 Championship in 1998.

A&M is a good team, but one K-State can beat, a team the Cats need to beat if they want to save this season.

If I were coaching this team, I'd fire up the videos of the games against Nebraska in 1998 and against Texas in 1999 as examples of how to play with your back against the wall.

But what do I know?

From cop to comedian

Former officer to do stand-up in Union

BY BECKY FISCHER
Kansas State Collegian

Almost a decade has passed since Juston McKinney sat behind the wheel of a police car.

He doesn't miss it much. "I remember patrolling one day and thinking, 'Do I want to be doing this at age 35?' I didn't want to always wonder 'what if,' so I left to pursue comedy," McKinney said.

The decision to change careers from police officer to comedian felt right, McKinney said.

"My first time onstage, I loved it," he said. "It felt great because it's what I've always wanted to do."

Television, clubs and college campuses all fall under McKinney's repertoire, and he will be performing at 8 p.m. Thursday in Union Station.

The Union Program Council's Arts and Entertainment committee is responsible for bringing McKinney to K-State.

"We watched a bunch of comedians on video tape," Megan Hughes, committee chair, said. "Juston was one of the funniest, so we picked him."

College campuses provide McKinney with a good perspective, he said.

"I'm not that old. I'm 30, so I have a few years left," McKinney said. "But I like to keep in touch with the real youth of America. It's refreshing."

Thirty is young for a successful comedian, said Michele Scherdin, college division director of McKinney's agency, Barbara Coppersmith & Associates.

"In the comedy world, 30 is young," Scherdin said. "I think Juston is successful because he's driven, along with being really funny."

Some of McKinney's accomplishments include appearances on television programs such as A&E's "100 Center Stage" and Comedy Central's "Premium Blend."

Two pilot shows he wrote for television have made it to CBS screenings but weren't picked up. Performing live at comedy festivals, clubs and campuses is something McKinney said he also devotes much time to.

One of his main pursuits is his own television show, he said.

"I'm working on a one-man show that debuts this week," McKinney said.

"Right now, I'll perform live at the HBO/Warner Bros. work space theater. Hopefully, from that, it will develop into its own TV show."

The show is a take-off of McKinney's own life, he said.

"I'll play all of the characters, including my aunt, my brother, my grandma," he said. "If it goes to television, I'll just play me, and there will be a cast of characters. That'd be much simpler."

Life has handed McKinney enough interesting situations to script a weekly show, he said.

"I grew up poor, and then I became a cop," he said. "That's a lot of material right there."

Performance

Comedian Juston McKinney will appear at 8 p.m. Thursday at Union Station in the K-State Student Union. Admission is free.

The fact that McKinney gets his material from his own life is what makes him good, Scherdin said.

"Juston has gone through some difficult times," she said. "He has a unique perspective on life because of that. His honest, unique perspective makes him funny. You won't see another comedian like him come along six months down the road."

Students will enjoy McKinney's high energy, Scherdin said.

"He's not mellow up there," she said. "He really gets into it and is all over the stage. He can work any crowd."

McKinney said his main objective onstage is to make people laugh.

"I'm not trying to open up people's eyes to anything. There's no hidden message in my jokes," he said. "I just want people to have a good time. I want to hear them laugh."

Touring acoustic artist to make stop on campus

Today, recording artist Jill Cohn will give students a taste of the talent that soon will take her into the studio for a fifth album.

Cohn will perform from noon to 1 p.m. at the K-State Student Union Courtyard as part of the Burger King Lunchtime Lounge series.

Cohn sings, plays guitar and piano, and the Seattle, Wash.-based artist has released four albums. Claire Mohlman, UPC Daytimes Committee chair, said she listened to Cohn's latest album, "The Absence of Moving."

"It's one of the types of music I listen to personally, and I think a lot of people will like it," she said. "She plays piano and guitar, so she's a well-rounded musician."

Cohn's acoustic storytelling style should appeal to the lunchtime crowd in the Union, and Mohlman said the artist brings a professional, polished performance that is unique to the usual performances.

"It's a professional sound and a concert atmosphere," she said. "She has a set that should be impressive, and she said she likes college atmospheres."

The Daytimes Committee sponsors the Burger King Lunchtime Lounge every other Wednesday, which is a venue for a variety of performance types. Mohlman said the different acts include local music, dance features and outside performers such as Cohn.

"We have a lot of local music, and the (Kansas State) Repertory Dance Company will perform next," she said. "We try to keep it pretty diverse."

with older houses," he said. "The problem is they have reached an age that they cannot be rehabilitated in a feasible manner that would offer the services that the students are requesting."

Students want more privacy, he said, and want their own bedrooms and bathrooms. Also, new housing will have to be Internet and communication compatible with the students' needs, which is not always the case in current housing, he said.

The demand for high-quality student housing is ever-changing, said Ockert Fourie, a senior city planner in charge of the city's long-range planning.

"Students are looking for better quality," Fourie said. "The older neighborhoods have traditionally been used for student housing, which will continue."

"But I do see a trend that students in the future will try to find better accommodations because the ones they are living in now are not quite up to standard and are not convenient for the needs of today."

He said the city will wrestle with these issues during its comprehensive plan update. City representatives will explore the future of student neighborhoods and will examine the presence of super duplexes.

Super duplexes are larger, out-of-character structures that are normally occupied by up to eight tenants, he said. These structures have been popping up all over Manhattan, he said, and are attracting students because they offer a high-quality living situation.

Will there be more student housing?

Wildcat Property Management owns some of the duplexes, Emig said. More of them will be built instead of larger apartment complexes, he said, because students do not want all the parties and noise that accompany the larger housing alternatives.

"I think students today and in the future are more serious about their education," he said. "We will see more of these duplexes built that are compatible with adjacent properties. These will not necessarily be the super duplex structures."

Fourie said he sees a greater demand for more off-campus housing, but he hopes the university will take on a greater responsibility in providing it. He said, so far, the burden has been put on the community, which has caused a lot of the deterioration in the older neighborhoods.

"I foresee the nature of housing to be different," he said. "There is an opportunity for the university to provide more housing off-campus for its students by forming a relationship with a private developer."

He said there is land north of the university that would be ideal for off-campus student development, but it is being used by the Department of Agriculture.

"The university has some responsibility for housing their students. The city doesn't just provide some services and not others and hope someone else will do it. The demand for more housing in Manhattan was created by the university, so they should do something about it."

Where will students live?

The older neighborhoods have reached their capacity to accommodate more people, Fourie said.

"It is not a good idea to further intensify them, but we don't really have too many options," he said. "The west side of Manhattan is the only place left where growth can take place, but that is a far distance from campus, which makes it less attractive for students."

Like many people who live in student-free neighborhoods, he said, western Manhattan residents may not welcome rental properties aimed at a student population.

When students move into their neighborhoods, he said they complain of extra traffic, less parking, low-maintenance and the extra noise that accompanies the student lifestyle.

"Not next to me, please." That is their attitude," he said. "There seems to be a desire from the community for student housing to be separate from the family-oriented neighborhoods."

Mary Ann Fleming, a spokeswoman for the South Manhattan Neighborhood Association, said it is not good when students are concentrated in a community.

"Walk down the streets east of campus and north of Poyntz and find out," Fleming said. "Older houses have been converted into apartments and look trashy and badly kept up. Liquor and beer bottles are displayed publicly, lawns aren't mowed, and the buildings are dilapidated."

"My vision for the future would be to see a greater responsibility from students and landlords."

She said she hopes to see students spread out across Manhattan and not overloading any particular region or neighborhood. When the areas become concentrated, she said, it drives community members out.

"I believe in integrated housing," she said. "I don't think any one housing style should take over a neighborhood."

Will there be rental inspections?

Before rental inspections can be a possibility, Fleming said the Manhattan City Commission needs to require rental registration. The city has no idea how many rental units it has at any given time because home owners do not always report if they are renting to tenants.

She said she would like to see mandatory rental inspections because no one should have to live in a dump. < B>

< B> "I really have no sympathy for the poor landlords that think this would pose a burden on themselves and their tenants," she said. "I think the expense is minor."

Rental inspections were brought up during City Commission meetings about a year ago, said Fourie, but the idea did not go anywhere. He said, with the high amount of adversity posed by renters at the meetings, he does not know if the inspections ever will be a possibility.

"There was a lot of opposition from rental property owners because the inspections would mean an additional cost for them," he said. "It would require improvements to the properties."

He said the commission examined a housing study, which suggested that housing in Manhattan would be improved if there was an inspection program because it would require people to reinvest in the properties.

Emig said he does not see rental inspections in Manhattan's future because this new program would be expensive for landlords and the city's requiring extra time and staff to implement the procedures.

"The cost to install an apartment inspection program far exceeds the benefits that would be reaped by the program," he said.

"I think the housing rental market is already self-governed. Students that are renting will tend to not rent to sub-standard apartments if good rental housing is available."

He said any apartment complex with three or more units is already inspected by the fire department, and the code enforcement department inspects apartments on an as-requested basis.

What is the future of off-campus housing?

No one knows what student housing will look like 20 years down the road. Community members and leaders have not forgotten students, however, and there will be discussions exploring future options for off-campus developments.

"Students are an important part of the community," Fourie said. "Almost 50 percent of the population and economic growth and prosperity in Manhattan depends on students. It is important we provide adequate, affordable housing for students."

"Through our comprehensive plan, hopefully we can create a greater dialogue between citizens, students and the administration on how we will deal with housing."

City reimbursed for skate park

BY MICHAEL WATSON
Kansas State Collegian

An agreement was approved during Tuesday's City Commission meeting allowing the city to be reimbursed for building a skate park in Manhattan.

Commissioner Mark Taussig said he was concerned with the cost of the project and what the parks environment would be like. Then he saw the skate park in Junction City, Kan.

"That is where everyone was at," he said. "They were on inline skates, skateboards and bicycles. It convinced me that this would be a good thing for Manhattan."

Ryan McCants, sophomore in electrical engineering and co-founder of the skate park committee, said he was a sophomore in high school when the park plans started. He said it has been a long process.

"We wanted to carry this dream out, even though we may not always be in Manhattan," he said.

The course of action for the skate park is to send the agreement to Wildlife and Parks. Specifications will be drawn for bids on equipment. Then the equipment will be installed on a concrete slab.

The committee will have to return to the Commission with bid prices, and the park is expected to be finished in the summer.

Commissioner Ed Klimiek said the young people involved with the skate park have been an inspiration. He challenged them to take their efforts back to school and to their friends. He said this is just one avenue of the youth council.

The Commission also accepted the final reports for the water and wastewater facilities plans and cost of services study. One scenario of the study is to consider adopting water conservation.

However, Taussig said he does not want to penalize people for watering their lawn. He said he does not want to tell the community they need to conserve.

"It is important to have a nice looking community with green yards," he said.

Dave MacGillivray, chairman of Springsted Incorporated, said the conservation scenario shows a wise use of resources and public funds.

The final reports were accepted. The results of the study serve as a basis for decision-making in the future.

The city staff will take the plans under consideration and make points for the commission to discuss.

In addition, Commissioner Brad Everett said members of the community need to support the Wildcats. The football team is going through some rough times, he said.

"If you have the opportunity to attend a football game, yell often," he said.

BIN LADEN

The network

Al-Qaeda is estimated to have anywhere from several hundred to several thousand members. It draws from a pool of more than 50,000 Afghan war veterans and other radical Muslims.

Cells of the organization are believed to operate in 60 countries, including the United States and Canada. Bin Laden also enjoys some support among Muslims who dislike U.S. influence on Arab governments, who feel their way of life is threatened by Western popular culture and who resent Israeli treatment of the Palestinians.

In addition to the most recent terrorist attacks, bin Laden's followers have been connected to the attack on the USS Cole in Yemen, the 1998 American embassy bombings in Tanzania and Kenya, the killing of German tourists outside Luxor, Egypt, and the 1993 bombing of the World Trade Center.

The group takes anywhere from four months to several years to execute an attack. Surveillance of the East Africa embassy bombings began in 1993, five years before they were executed.

As far as funding, terrorism is not very expensive, said one senior Treasury Department official who tracks terrorists' money. The total cost of the 1993 World Trade Center bombing totaled about $18,000, including the purchase of equipment, vans, two apartments, storage space and plane tickets.

The al-Qaeda network has not limited its terror to bombings, though.

Some information suggests that the group has been involved in assassination attempts on Egyptian President Hosni Mubarak, Pakistani Prime Minister Benazir Bhutto and Jordanian crown prince — now king — Abdullah. Bin Laden also has planned attempts against President Clinton and Pope John Paul.

U.S. actions

Bin Laden has been on the FBI's 10 Most Wanted Fugitives List since 1999, and the U.S. State Department has offered $5 million for his reward.

Still, the alleged mastermind behind the world's deadliest terrorist attacks has continued to elude his enemies for years.

One senior administration official said, "We are serious about going after him. He is serious about going after us. If we can nail his ass, we will. But it is going to be action and reaction for a long time."

Finding bin Laden is the first obstacle, though.

Most recently, he has been seen near Jalalabad, a city in eastern Afghanistan. He moves three or four times weekly, living in mud huts, tent cities and caves. He is accompanied by a security entourage, including heavily armed bodyguards and anti-aircraft guns mounted on trucks.

Often, several sites are set up for him, and he picks one at the last second.

Eradicating the world of terrorism could take years, but President Bush has vowed that the people responsible for these atrocities will be brought to justice.

"We will direct every resource at our command — every means of diplomacy, every tool of intelligence, every instrument of law enforcement, every financial influence, and every necessary weapon of war — to the disruption and to the defeat of the global terror network," Bush said in his address to Congress and the nation.

airfield at Mazar-e-Sharif, a Taliban-controlled city in northern Afghanistan that opposition forces are trying to overrun.

Newbold would not discuss Tuesday's bombing.

Newbold said the nine days of U.S. and British bombing, including attacks that have aided the northern alliance forces, have put the Taliban in jeopardy of losing Mazar-e-Sharif.

He said the Taliban is in danger of being cut off right now at Mazar-e-Sharif and could lose control there within days, depending on when the northern alliance decides to move into the city. Losing that city, which has been a staging ground for the Taliban since 1998, would hurt them in two ways, he said.

"One is that it's a crossroads mostly for resupply of their forces," he said. "The other one is a psychological one: As most of you know, Mazar-e-Sharif has been fought over for three years now, and it's changed hands. Its loss to the Taliban would be a significant setback."

Newbold said that while U.S. forces are not working directly with northern alliance troops on the ground, the airstrikes are reducing dramatically the Taliban's ability to carry out military action.

"The combat power of the Taliban has been eviscerated," Newbold said.

Victoria Clarke, chief spokeswoman for Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld, cautioned reporters not to assume that a drop-off in the number of airstrikes in the days ahead meant the anti-terror campaign was easing.

"While at times you may see a certain leveling off of activities, other, less visible activities may be under way," she said, alluding to financial, political, diplomatic and other behind-the-scenes efforts to crack down on terrorists. She also might have been referring to the expected start soon of U.S. special operations on the ground in Afghanistan to root out Taliban and al-Qaeda leaders.

Newbold made a similar point.

"Some days you'll see that the number of aircraft go up, and sometimes there will be few, and some days there won't be any," he said. "Regardless, we're going to keep up the pressure on the terrorists and on the Taliban leadership."

Monday's attacks were against 12 target areas, Newbold said, using about 100 strike aircraft. About 90 of the warplanes flew from U.S. Navy carriers in the Arabian Sea, and between six and eight of the 100 were land-based Air Force bombers, he said. Five Tomahawk cruise missiles were fired from U.S. ships.

On many previous days of the air campaign, only 10 to 15 carrier-based aircraft were used, along with 5-10 bombers.

Asked why the low-flying, relatively slow AC-130 gunships were used Monday, Newbold said the precision of its side-firing guns reduces the chance of collateral damage, the military's term for injury to innocents or unintended damage to nearby structures. He would not be more specific.

sense of community."

Stephanie Bannister, assistant director of Housing and Dining Services, supervises Jardine and she said she agreed that large apartment buildings would detract from the complex atmosphere.

"We will never have nine-floor apartments here," Bannister said. "We would lose everything that makes us a unique and wonderful place to live."

She said that if the department can use the same amount of land but increase the amount of residents in a community-friendly way, it will do it.

"We may be able to increase numbers somewhat," she said. "If we can, we will certainly do it, but we are not going to take away from the neighborhoods that are already there with a significant increase of people."

An overhaul like this would require years of work because Housing and Dining has to build a new complex simultaneously. Werring said, while catering to the residents' needs at the current complex.

Even though the department is daydreaming, he said the plan's first phase is coming soon. By November or early spring, he said he hoped feasibility studies will have begun so the department can identify the cost of the project.

If all goes well, he said, he could foresee the first construction efforts occurring three years from now.

"We are thinking about this very carefully and taking it one step at a time," he said. "And they are very slow steps."

Proposal to relieve insurers

Michael Wilds, chief executive officer of Kansas Farm Bureau, said the plan will help relieve the $100 billion coming out of the insurance pool because of the terrorist attacks.

"The plan will help relieve pressure of re-insurance rates," he said. "Despite that, there will still be upward costs next year. There will still be pressure, but it won't be as severe if the plan goes through."

The proposal would split the costs of property claims between the government and the insurance industry.

Taxpayers would pick up 80 percent of the first $20 billion in costs next year. Insurers would pay the rest. The government's share of costs would decrease gradually through 2004 and then come to an end, senior administration officials said.

U.S. insurance companies that write policies protecting property could face payments of $30 billion to $50 billion for the Sept. 11 attacks in New York and northern Virginia — the biggest insured loss ever.

The administration's plan is an alternative to legislation drafted by lawmakers and supported by the insurance industry, which would create a government-backed insurance industry pool to cover future terrorism losses. If insurance losses exceed the pool amount, the government would cover the difference. Administration officials said the proposal would put the government in position of directly regulating the insurance industry and possibly rates charged for coverage. American insurance companies are regulated by the states in which they do business.

Gretchen Schaefer, spokeswoman for the American Insurance Association, said the trade group is eager to see details of the proposal, but would not comment on it beforehand.

Wilds said Kansas re-insurance rates will be affected.

"Kansas Farm Bureau has no direct exposure to the events in New York," Wilds said. "However, the events in New York will affect the re-insurance market, which in general will put upward rates on re-insurance rates everywhere."

Wilds said Farm Bureau's policy holders are in good condition in terms of coverage.

"All of our policy holders can rest assured that they will be covered for the insurance plans they have," he said.

U.S. troops set to launch missions

BY ROBERT BURNS
The Associated Press

WASHINGTON, D.C. — Special operations troops capable of clandestine warfare are poised aboard a U.S. aircraft carrier in the Indian Ocean, ready to launch search-and-destroy missions against the terrorists in Afghanistan and their Taliban supporters, military officials said Wednesday.

In another new twist, Air Force F-15E fighter-bombers flew attack missions in Afghanistan on Wednesday for the first time since the air campaign began, another defense official said. Several F-15Es flew from a base in the Persian Gulf area, the official said, speaking on condition of anonymity.

The official did not know the F-15Es' targets. Previously the only land-based aircraft flying combat missions in Afghanistan had been Air Force B-2, B-1B and B-52 long-range bombers.

Defense Secretary Donald H.

Rumsfeld said in the immediate aftermath of the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks that the military portion of America's response would rely heavily on special operations forces. He and other U.S. officials have refused to discuss details, including timing.

Zoo program helps to train volunteers

Janna Wood always loved animals but did not pursue a major related to them until this fall. That's when she changed her major from biological engineering to wildlife biology.

"It's more what I wanted to do in the first place," she said. "I'm glad I'm doing something I like."

Now, she's a docent-in-training at Sunset Zoological Park. The docent program, which began in September, is about 12 weeks long and meets once a week. Each week, a different lesson is taught — ranging from zoo history to handling animals to docent requirements.

Wood said she is looking forward to the training because it will give her experience.

"I think this might help get my foot in the door," she said.

Tessa Miller, sophomore in pre-veterinary medicine, said she also joined the program for this reason.

"When I get out of vet school, I want to be a zoo vet, so I thought this might give me some experience," she said.

Shaneé Anderson, curator of education, said most join the docent program for experience.

"Most people come through training because they want to go into this career," she said.

The training is for two volunteer programs, the docent program and the explorer program. The docent program is for ages 18 and older, and the explorer program is for ages 14 to 18.

PATHS OF ANTHRAX

SYMPTOMS

About 95 percent of anthrax cases are contracted through cuts or breaks in skin. A rash appears within one or two days of exposure. The bumps then turn into fluid-filled vesicles, which in several days will turn black.

The rarest, but deadliest form, Anthrax spores, once they lodge in the lungs, can take from two to 60 days to become active. Initial symptoms resemble those of flu. Within days, fluid build-up around the lungs, and the accumulation of toxins released by the bacteria lead to difficulty in breathing, toxic shock and death.

Eating the meat from infected animals can lead to nausea, vomiting, intestinal cramping, fever and severe diarrhea. This type is relatively rare.

TREATMENT

Antibiotics are effective against naturally occurring strains. Untreated, 20 percent of skin anthrax cases are fatal.

Antibiotics can be effective in the first days after infection. Death occurs in 90 percent of untreated cases. A vaccine can prevent, anthrax before exposure to the bacteria, but it is not widely available.

Antibiotics, including penicillin, tetracycline and ciprofloxacin. About 25 to 60 percent of untreated cases result in death.

Local and university offices are taking precautions to guard against anthrax, but officials still are warning people not to panic.

"Don't panic, but be cautious," said Ann Harts, vice president of planning and business development for Mercy Health Center. "We're prepared to answer questions and assist anyone. We're urging people not to panic, though."

Vice president for administration and finance Tom Rawson sent a letter to all university department heads regarding anthrax.

"All departments are urged to take precautions to ensure the safety and well-being of the campus community," the letter read. "Departments may wish to provide dust masks and/or gloves for employees directly involved with receiving or opening mail.

"We will continue to pass along information that will help us maintain a safe working environment."

AMERICA RESPONDS

Financial Aid records office wear gloves while they sort and open mail. They chose to not use the particle masks, Sheri Staten, supervisor of records said.

Students also are advised to wash their hands often.

"Believe me, if there's anything suspicious, we don't touch it," Staten said. "We're on alert for it — aware of the possibility. It's better to be safe than sorry."

At Mercy Health Center, the staff is undergoing training so they can identify the symptoms related to anthrax. Officials also are attending statewide meetings to discuss facilities' capabilities and hospital linkage, and the staff is surveying its own facilities to determine if and where any improvements can be made.

"If someone came in today and thought they had anthrax, we would be very prepared to take care of them," Harts said. "On a scale of one to 10 — with 10 being the highest — we'd be a 10."

And Manhattan Post office workers are on the lookout for target or suspicious mail, which includes anything odd-looking or shaped or anything with a different return address than post mark.

"We have made employees aware of the new threat," said Cary Holcomb, delivery supervisor for the post office. "We're definitely concerned. Nobody is not showing up for work because of this, though."

Wyandotte Co. attorneys settle gas gouging cases

KANSAS CITY, Kan. — Three companies named in a gasoline price gouging investigation after the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks have agreed to a settlement with the Wyandotte County District Attorney.

In the hours following the attacks, some station owners across Kansas raised the price of fuel to as high as $5 per gallon for regular, unleaded gasoline.

District Attorney Nick A. Tomasic's office said Tuesday that the companies have agreed to refund to customers the difference between what customers paid after the attacks and what the station was charging Sept. 11 before the attacks occurred.

The three companies that settled are Sardinia, Inc.; Barik Petroleum; and Hafiz and Sons, Inc. All three stations are located in Kansas City, Kan.

Each station also will pay $750 to the United Way Sept. 11 Fund and $250 in statutory fees to the district attorney to cover investigative costs.

3 middle school boys attempt anthrax hoax
PRAIRIE VILLAGE — Three teen-age boys were arrested Tuesday and are accused of plotting an anthrax hoax in hopes that classes would be canceled for the day.

Police said the boys — two 13-year-olds and one 14-year-old — put crushed plaster in an envelope and hid it underneath the door of the office at Indian Hills Middle School during a lunch period.

A parent entered the office with her small child and picked up the envelope. As she placed it on a counter, powder leaked from the envelope onto the child's arm.

Campus Calendar is the College's campus bulletin board service. Items in the calendar can be published up to three times. Items might not appear because of space constraints but are guaranteed to appear on the day of the activity. powder was anthrax, police said.

An investigation determined the powder was plaster from the school's art room. Police said the three eighth-graders admitted they devised the plan during their first-period class and that they intended the powder to simulate anthrax, hoping school would be dismissed for the day.

Classes went on as scheduled, and the boys were taken to the Johnson County Juvenile Intake Assessment Center. They could be charged by the Johnson County District Attorney with making a criminal threat, which is a felony.

Sprint announces 6,000 layoffs by mid-November

TOPEKA — Word that Sprint Corp. planned large layoffs was not only bad news Wednesday for company employees but seemed likely to make the state's budget problems worse.

Sprint announced about half of its planned 6,000 layoffs would come in the Kansas City metropolitan area, with as many as 700 at its new corporate headquarters in Overland Park. The company said the layoffs would occur by mid-November.

In Topeka, State Budget Director Duane Goossen said it would be difficult to assess the effects of the layoffs. He said that he and other state officials already were worried about how the effects of the Sept. 11 attacks would ripple through the Kansas economy.

NATION IN BRIEF

By The Associated Press

Leader of NASA program announces retirement plan

WASHINGTON, D.C. — Daniel S. Goldin, who is the longest-serving head of the nation's space agency, announced Wednesday he is resigning from NASA effective Nov. 17.

"I love this agency," Goldin said in a speech televised to the far-flung NASA centers. "I wish I could be here for decades. But it's time."

Goldin, 61, was appointed in 1992 and has supervised large changes in the space agency, including the launch and construction of the International Space Station.

No replacement has been named, but Goldin said he is working with the Bush administration to select an interim acting administrator.

A NASA release said Goldin is accepting a position with the Council on Competitiveness, an organization of corporate executives, university presidents and labor leaders that seeks to improve U.S. leadership in world markets.

Senate committee backs plan for train safety funds

WASHINGTON, D.C. — Senators put aside divergent ideas on Amtrak's future and endorsed a $1.8 billion measure to increase safety and security measures on passenger trains.

The Senate Commerce Committee voted unanimously Wednesday to send the measure to the full Senate after members agreed to hold back some 19 proposed changes, among them restoring service to the Pacific Northwest and adding money to refurbish equipment.

Those changes still can be offered as amendments on the Senate floor, however, so a lengthy battle might be ahead.

Following the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks, Amtrak compiled a $3.2 billion list of steps to improve security, rail safety and ridership capacity.

House Republicans launch air safety budget proposal

WASHINGTON, D.C. — House Republicans on Wednesday unveiled a White House-backed plan to make the nation's airways safer that includes new federal controls over airport security.

The bill faces a tough challenge from a Senate-passed measure that would go further by making all airport screeners federal employees.

The aviation security bill is the third major leg of Congress' response to the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks, preceded by passage of a $40 billion emergency spending bill and a $15 billion bill to prop up struggling airlines.

"I'd go to the bars until 3, discos stay open later than bars until 4 or 5, then after-hour discos"

Spanish student misses home country's nightlife

BY KECIA N. SEYB

Kansas State Collegian

His man loves sports and reading — and not just Sports Illustrated. Javier Crespan, graduate student in political science and an international student from Spain, said he enjoys reading novels. Currently he is reading three novels.

"I like to read good novels. I read a lot," he said, "but I don't like to analyze like they do in literature courses."

When he reads simply for his enjoyment, he said, he likes to read in Spanish.

"I also have to read a lot for my studies," he said, "in English."

His favorite sport is soccer, and he has played a few times since he came to Manhattan about two months ago. He said he likes basketball and tennis, but the slower pace of K-State's tennis matches annoyed him.

"I went to a Wildcat match. It was quite boring," Crespan said. "It was too long. There were a lot of breaks."

People in Spain do not play baseball, he said, but he watched a Kansas City Royals' game since he has been in Kansas and said he thought the game of baseball was interesting and fun.

K-State was not Crespan's first choice for his exchange program — Denver University was — but he said.

Manhattan's size has its advantages. "It's easier to know people. In the cities, everyone does their own stuff and doesn't pay attention to other people," he said. "You can know the places in one week, know where to go. It's easier to move."

There are several things Crespan misses about his home city, Santiago de Compostela, especially the late hours at the bars, and fish because he lived in a fishing region. He said the 2 a.m. closing time of Manhattan bars is not late enough.

"I'd go to the bars until 3, discos stay open later than bars until 4 or 5, then after-hour discos," he said.

"Here, you have to come back early — the bars close at 2."

Director uses humanity to find success

BY TARA PATTY
Kansas State Collegian

With a quote from the classic children's book "The Little Prince" as her motto, Cathy Harmes has shaped her career in human relations for 30 years.

"My favorite quote is from the Little Prince, and it goes, 'It is only with the heart that one can see rightly...,'" said Harmes, director of human resources for the city of Manhattan.

"You have to have the human touch. A person can walk in with all of the technical know-how and still not be successful because they lack that human quality."

Harmes, who has been with the city for the last five years, deals with customer service. Harmes has been working in the human relations field for about 30 years, starting with the completion of her master's degree in public administration with a concentration in human relations from K-State.

"She cares about the people No. 1, and she takes great joy and satisfaction in what she does," said Crystal Malchese, human relations technician for the city of Manhattan. "She wants the best for the city and the best for the employees."

Within Harmes' tenure in the profession, she has seen several changes throughout the field, namely from the Civil Rights movement and the labor movement of the 80s. In addition to these movements, changing demographics within the work force and the emergence of jobs which utilize different types of employees have strongly contributed to the evolution of the profession, she said.

"I tell people human relations morphs about every two to three years," Harmes said.

Legislation such as the Americans with Disabilities Act and the Family Medical Leave Act also have affected the way human relations professionals fulfill their jobs, Harmes said.

"There used to be a lot of nepotism and Good Ol' Boy mentality. Now the profession is more professional in conduct and demeanor," she said. "The Family Medical Leave Act is good for families. We're beginning to see that personal lives affect jobs, ability on the job."

Larry Hackney, human relations specialist for the city, attributed much of Harmes' success to her personal attributes and experience in the field.

"A couple of things make her successful in her job, are attributes specific to Cathy. She is very driven, conscientious, she arrives early for work every morning, not just some mornings," he said. "She is also driven, hard-working and pays close attention to detail. She could bring these attributes to any profession and be successful, but it is her experience in this field that makes her well-suited."

Hackney said a person can come into the field with multiple and advanced degrees but lack experience.

"Experience accrued is important," Hackney said.

Harmes said that with her job, she also handles ongoing continuing improvement and training programs and incentives to keep people rewarded.

"Individuals thinking about a career in human relations should have a good basis in law because of legal issues like nondiscrimination and know the legislation, which in the last 30 years has changed dramatically with the Civil Rights movement and the ADA," Harmes said.

Individuals considering this profession must be ready to be independent, impartial and not afraid to make decisions, she said.

"You can't please everyone. You have to be willing to make the right decision without fearing the fallout," she said.

She said interested students should utilize compensation classes, psychology and get an internship to get introduced to the field. Harmes said she would advise students to obtain at least a bachelor's and even a master's degree, as well as complete an internship to gain experience and work with professionals in the field.

"Working at an internship is an invaluable experience," she said.

Harmes said she considers the No. 1 asset to any student wanting to work in this field is an internship.

"Even if it is not required, even if you have to work a year without pay, you have to work in the environment and you need experience. We have two interns because I feel it is so important," she said.

Team to evaluate K-State; officials expect high marks

BY SARAH BAHARI
Kansas State Collegian

Despite a tight budget and limited resources, university officials say they are confident K-State will be reaccredited as a four-year institution.

"K-State has had excellent management in dealing with shortfalls," said Bob Kruh, who helped compile K-State's self-study report, "but we could do so much more. The accreditors realize our problems."

The North Central Association, an accreditation institution, will be on campus Monday through Wednesday for its 10-year on-site evaluation of the university.

The 10-member accreditation team will visit with students, faculty and staff. Several months later, it will release a full report, detailing any improvements or problems the team finds.

It especially is important for students to give their input, Kruh said.

"If students have good things to say, we should keep doing that. If they've got some worries, they ought to make those known," he said. "Students are the main players here. They have insight that the team could benefit from."

The accreditors evaluate five criteria: whether the university is fulfilling its mission or purpose, its organization of resources, accomplishment of purposes, continued accomplishment of purposes and the integrity of the university.

If the university lost its accreditation, it would be devastating, Kruh said.

Students would not be eligible for any federal funding, including financial aid. Graduates also would have a harder time finding work in their field.

The only area officials foresee any problems with is the accomplishment of purposes, Kruh said, which includes how well the university assesses student outcomes.

That includes interviewing seniors and students several years out of college to evaluate how well the university's instruction prepared them.

The University of Nebraska, The University of Colorado and Ohio State University all were reaccredited, but given provisions. They have to periodically report back to their accreditors on the progress they make as far as student outcomes.

However, Ron Downey, director of planning and analysis, said K-State has a good chance of receiving high marks in that area.

"A few months ago, I was concerned," he said, "but we've made a great deal of progress since then. I think we have a fair shot. The faculty's been very responsive."

In its last evaluation in 1991, K-State was fully reaccredited with no provisions.

The criticisms the accreditors made included non-competitive faculty salaries, a small base budget, a poor state budget system that did not reward accomplishments, lack of state-of-the-art equipment and library space.

Kruh said many of these criticisms would remain, but some have been solved.

"These problems will certainly be cited as it continues to lag," he said. "Despite continued austerity, we will be OK on that front."

Take a sigh of relief. Fall break is upon us. The Editorial Board wants to share its weekend plans.
Michelle Bertuglia: I am flying to Vegas and going to porn star school. Graduation is closer than you think.
Jessica Pitts: Sleep, sleep, sleep.
April Middleton: Since my spot in porn school was filled, I will stay in Manhattan and make every attempt to appear in police reports Monday.
JJ Duncan: I don't think it's legal to print what I'm doing this weekend in the newspaper, and even if it was, I don't think I would talk about it.

Nick Bratkovic: Praying for a Chiefs victory over Arizona.
Dan Smith: Going home to see mom with my woman and probably coming up with column ideas for Joe Elkinton.
Jamie Barrett: Dancing on the tables at Rusty's Last Chance Restaurant and Saloon with Jessica and April.
Corbin H. Crable: Going apartment hunting in Johnson County and maybe tossing crumpled up dollar bills at Jamie, Jessica and April.

Chelsea Schmidt: Although I would like to be hanging out with my friends who never get to see me anymore (sorry, guys). I will be sunning in Phoenix between sessions at the Society for News Design Conference. Gotta love 95-degree weather.
Bryan Scribner: Between writing three papers, I will make a few calls to the Fourum.

The Collegian's Campus Fourum is an anonymous call-in system that allows readers to voice their opinions on topics relevant to the publication.

Hey, Matt Killingsworth, from one guy to another, I just wanted to thank you for being the definition of everything I have ever hated about the male population.

Hey you, Collegian, keep your masochistic writers away from my friends.

Joe Elkinton, for the first time you said something I agree with. You do have the innate ability to piss people off.

I am going to make a bold statement. I think the Cats will go undefeated for the rest of the year.

Killingsworth, you were right on with that one.

Sex without love, casual intercourse, hell yeah — sign me up.

I don't know about the rest of you, but I enjoy making bird and monkey noises in my dorm room.

Micah, Micah, Micah, don't knock it until you try it, buddy.

I hear you, Micah, but amen Matt Killingsworth.

The reason there is braille on drive-up ATM machines is because they are manufactured, meaning they are all created for the same purpose, whether they be in a building or a drive up window.

This is a message for Matt Killingsworth. It is probably a good thing you told us all your opinions on sex because now you are never going to get a girlfriend, so you might as well transfer.

Micah Hawkinson, will you marry me?

Matt Killingsworth, does your mother know what you are writing about?

Joe Elkinton, we are all now dumber for having read your column.

Support from fans essential for football team's success

Editor,
I'm a graduate of the class of 1983. I'm also a K-State football season ticket holder. Recently, I attended the K-State vs. Colorado game, and like most of the rest of you, was very disappointed in the result. I also was quite disappointed of the result in the Texas Tech game.

Over the past decade, we have watched head coach Bill Snyder work tremendous accomplishments in our football program. And we have come to expect seasons that regularly will produce 10 or 11 wins. I hope that trend continues with both the team and the fans.

However, we recently have fallen on hard times. And I must say that we cannot blame the football team entirely. We, as fans, have a responsibility to cheer our team on, even when K-State is playing poorly. In fact, that is especially the time to be cheering our team on.

When I attended K-State years ago, I endured five seasons of either poor or mediocre football. And then a little glimmer of light showed through with the 1982 team going to the Independence Bowl. Part of the reason for those horrible seasons was the attitude of literally everyone around.

Then I noticed something very different when Snyder was hired. Moral victories were not acceptable, and a positive attitude became crucial to winning.

Interestingly enough, when Ernie Barrett was campaigning around the state for a complete turnaround of K-State's football team, he made it known that first, the fans must come to the games in larger numbers and cheer, and then the team will do the winning — not the other way around.

So now K-Staters have a choice before them. And, interestingly enough, we are playing Texas A&M this weekend, the team noted for being the home of the 12th man crowd. It is more important than ever that this weekend, we lift our voices resoundingly in cheer as we impress the visiting Texans with the voice of the best fans in college football.

This football team is talented. We proved that in the Oklahoma game. Now let's rally the troops, both fan and player alike, and show them our purple pride.

— John L. Works

Forgotten minority

Transfer students lost amid experienced K-Staters

We sit next to you in class. We sweat with you at the Chester E. Peters Recreation Complex, and you might have spotted us at your favorite hangout last weekend.

Despite these shared experiences and the fact that we flood the campus each year, we are a minority — a minority that is not easily detected. We are not identified by skin color, religion or area of study, and we are one of the most diverse groups on campus.

We are K-State's transfer students, and our lives are quintessentially different than the average College Joe.

Granted, we do not suffer as much culture shock as international students. For most of us, Manhattan does not present any large alterations in our weekend plans or what we ate for dinner last night.

Still, disorientation is our constant companion. It is like an itch from little teeny hairs after a haircut: minor, yet persistent. The worst part of the itch, our confusion, is that we try and hide it to maintain dignity. People just assume transfers know what they are doing.

A little secret: just because students attended another college, be it Highland Community College or Harvard, it does not make them K-State experts. Our blood most likely does not run purple yet. Basically we are freshmen with a couple extra years under our belts, which have expanded to accommodate years of pizza and beer.

We, just like fresh-faced, first-year students, don't really understand how enrollment works or whether there is a working bus system. We don't know which bars are the best or where to live. We either fear or look forward to the Union Food Court, depending upon previous experience.

Of course, we could just ask questions. But that gets stale fast. I save my questions for truly essential information like whether they really check IDs in Aggieville. For everything else, I fly by the very seat of my pants. My line schedule's map was discreetly hidden in my backpack this fall, but rest assured, a couple buildings were highlighted.

People seem to assume we understand the mechanisms of the Little Apple. Yet some conundrums exist. Like what the heck is a Purple Power Play? How does anyone ever find a place to park? And what entrance does everybody use at the football stadium?

The worst part of being a transfer student is trying to establish credibility with the school. We don't have enough K-State hours to join specific honor societies or receive certain scholarships. I can see the need for these regulations, but there still are harms. Some students will not be able to participate in desired activities until their fourth year.

For some, these difficulties can be avoided with careful planning. This might be possible for many community college students, but not for students like myself who realized they went to the wrong four-year institution.

These regulations are associated with some twisted, yet humorous, ironies. Last week, I took a composition skills test so I could continue with the majors I haven't even been allowed to declare yet. I ran through the test, question by question, until I stopped dead in my tracks. The last section contained two news stories published in this semester's Collegian.

There it was, staring back at me. I was being tested on one of my own articles. Obviously, no one thought to consider the author could be a mere pre-major peon.

Truly, these experiences are amusing.

Somehow, amid all the lost grades on general requirements, transfers blaze ahead. Many are campus leaders and high scholastic achievers.

Despite the challenges, there are plenty of laughs along the way. K-State has provided us with a great environment to continue what we began somewhere else.

Dana is a sophomore in advertising and print journalism. You can e-mail her at des898@ksu.edu.

Mid-day nappers might suffer from sleep disorder, not laziness

I awoke from a mid-afternoon nap around 6 p.m. last Monday. After my roommate prodded me, informing me I had slept through dinner, I realized I was late to my staff meeting as well. Being the ever-professional columnist I am, I ran out of my residence hall, determined to catch the remaining portion of the meeting.

If the story of mid-day slumber and eternal rushing about sounds familiar, you, too, might have Delayed Sleep Phase Syndrome.

What many of us have dismissed as procrastination or laziness actually might be symptoms of DSPS.

DSPS is a disorder of the body's timing system, commonly referred to as the biological clock. The clock is delayed, with later circadian rhythms than the average person. This delayed rhythm leads those with DSPS to function at a lesser level during the day. People with DSPS are typical night owls who feel most alert and creative during the evening according to www.geocities.com/HotSprings/1123/dsp.html.

Although the medical cause is unknown, cases of DSPS are widespread and very common, especially among young adults.

Susan Powell

A person with DSPS is not an insomniac. They are able to fall asleep naturally, if allowed to follow their delayed sleep-wake cycle.

However, this pattern comes into direct conflict with society's daily schedule, such as the dreaded 8:30 a.m. classes.

DSPS can develop gradually or suddenly. According to www.sleepdisorderchannel.com, it results from "a disturbance between the patient's internal biological clock and the external environment." The disorder is not an elaborate excuse to sleep in Monday mornings. It can be found in the DSM-IV classification of mental disorders.

What many sufferers might consider fatigue or laziness during the day actually could be signs of DSPS. A common symptom is the inability to fall asleep before 1 or 2 a.m. A person with DSPS might try to sleep before then, but cannot do so naturally. The need to wake early for classes or work disrupts the sleep-wake pattern of those with DSPS, making it difficult to wake before noon.

Often, a person will use many alarm clocks or rely on a prodding roommate to wake them in the morning.

Another sign of DSPS is the feeling of drowsiness during the day, especially the early morning hours. DSPS sufferers tend to sleep in on the weekends, often past noon, to make up for lost hours of sleep during the week. Afternoon naps might also make up lost time.

Yes, these symptoms sound characteristic of the average college student, but there are a few more serious symptoms.

A person who tries to sleep at a decent hour but cannot is fighting their internal circadian rhythm. If forced to sleep, the body will resist for at least half an hour, if not longer. Although it is possible for someone with DSPS to lapse into earlier sleep patterns, this reversion does not tend to last long. However, DSPS lasts at least a month, usually longer.

Since a person affected with DSPS is out of sync with society's schedule, there are treatments available to help change the delayed sleep-wake cycle.

One way is to talk with a sleep specialist. It is recommended to keep a sleep log for two weeks beforehand, monitoring the times you go to bed, fall asleep, awake and nap. A sleep specialist can be located through the following Web site: www.users.cloud9.net/~thorpy.

Some therapeutic methods used by doctors and specialists include bright light therapy and chronotherapy.

Bright light therapy consists of a patient being exposed to bright light no later than an hour after waking. The exposure, varying per patient, tends to advance sleep onset, and thus leads to an earlier wake time.

Chronotherapy, first suggested by C.A. Czeisler in 1981, is used to manipulate the sleep-wake cycle. This attempts to change the patient's circadian rhythm, allowing them to follow a more normal sleep schedule. Specifically, the patient will go to bed and wake three hours later than the night before until the cycle has moved completely around the clock to the desired time of sleep.

Since both practices are not 100 percent effective and we have schedules we must adhere to, these methods are not always the best option for college students.

A more appropriate method of change for students could be an overall change in behavior. For example, exercising in the morning instead of the evening. Practice stress reduction techniques, like yoga, or try to avoid stressful situations altogether. The last suggestion might be the least popular: avoid caffeine, alcohol and tobacco consumption.

It is not impossible to escape the trappings of DSPS. By gradually changing your attitude and behaviors, you will develop different sleep-wake patterns — patterns that might cohere with your evil morning classes.

Varney's to present check to Red Cross; T-shirt sales continue

BY MICHAEL WATSON
Kansas State Collegian

Powercats and American flags have gone together in Manhattan since the Sept. 11 attacks.

N-Zone Sportswear, Varney's Book Store and the K-State Student Union used these two symbols as a fund-raiser for their disaster relief fund.

"This wasn't about us," Jeff Levin, Varney's manager, said. "This is about the students, the community and the fans. We were just the collector. This was a way for people to express their giving. It was phenomenal. It has been because of K-Staters and the community."

Varney's will be presenting a check for $150,212.50 to the American Red Cross at noon Friday at the Kansas Farm Bureau.

The money will help relief efforts in New York.

All of the proceeds from the first 2,044 T-shirts went to the relief fund. Varney's ordered 19,965 more T-shirts. Of those shirts, $6.50 went to the American Red Cross and $3.50 covered the costs of producing the shirts.

Levin said they had to keep some money to absorb the cost of producing the shirts.

There still is no profit being made from the shirts. "All the proceeds from the first 2,000 were donated. It was so popular that we thought we would go broke. We were covering the costs from our own pocket," he said.

The cutoff for proceeds to benefit the American Red Cross was Sept. 30. Since then, Varney's has donated proceeds to the United Way of Riley County.

"We were concerned that with national giving, local charities would suffer," Levin said. "It's important that we are helping locally as much as we are nationally."

Levin said more than 3,000 shirts have been sold so far to benefit the United Way. Each day, they are selling more. People are buying them in the store, and people are buying them online.

The United Way has a fund-raising goal of $518,000. Levin said if this goal is exceeded, the extra money will go to the disaster relief fund.

Scott Haverkamp, general manager of N-Zone Sportswear, said they will continue to support Varney's as long as they want to continue selling the T-shirts.

"We're going to continue selling them at this point — indefinitely," Levin said.

House bill increases government control to inhibit terrorist money operations

THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON, D.C. — The House overwhelmingly passed a measure Wednesday expanding the government's power to cut money flows to terrorist networks amid protests from key senators that the legislation should not have been stripped from President Bush's anti-terrorism package.

The vote for the bill, which is supported by the White House, was 412-1. It was adopted under a special rule requiring limited debate and a two-thirds vote as opposed to the customary simple majority.

The legislation is intended to fight money laundering around the world, thwart the financing of terrorism and protect the U.S. banking system from illicit money. It would give the treasury secretary authority to require special record-keeping and reporting rules for American banks and other financial institutions and would make it a crime to smuggle more than $10,000 over U.S. borders.

Rep. Marge Roukema, R-N.J., who wrote the smuggling provision, called the legislation a significant step down the right track to cripple the terrorist network.

In the Senate, the anti-money-laundering measure is attached to the counterterrorism legislation sparked by the Sept. 11 attacks against the World Trade Center and the Pentagon.

The House and Senate both have passed versions of the popular anti-terrorism legislation. But the House version does not contain the money-laundering provisions, a separation that could be the death warrant for strong anti-money-laundering legislation, Sen. Carl Levin, D-Mich., told reporters Tuesday.

There potentially is a lot of mischief to be played with stand-alone money-laundering legislation in negotiations for a compromise between House and Senate lawmakers, said Sen. Paul Sarbanes, D-Md., chairman of the Senate Banking Committee.

The deep-pocketed banking industry has been lobbying for changes in the legislation. The American Bankers Association, financial services giant Citigroup and investment banking firm J.P. Morgan Chase are among those that want Congress to leave some of the details about what banks can do up to the Treasury Department rather than spell out specifics in the law.

"This is not a moment for politics as usual to rear its ugly head in the Capitol," said Sen. John Kerry, D-Mass. He underlined the political influence of Texas bankers.

Bipartisan legislation to fight money laundering died in Congress last year, partly because of heavy lobbying by Texas bankers, who contend they are overburdened with federal paperwork requirements because of the large volume of cash transactions made over the border with Mexico.

GREAT EXPECTATIONS

Mike Shepherd/Collegian

Patterson optimistic for year

BY DAN SMITH
Kansas State Collegian

Women's basketball head coach Deb Patterson is excited to start the 2001 women's basketball season. And one doesn't have to delve very deep into the Wildcats' prospectus to find out why.

One year removed from a disappointing 12-16 record that saw the Cats win just two of 16 games in Big 12 Conference play, Patterson's squad takes on a whole new look and a somewhat new attitude for the new season, which begins Nov. 16 with a tough contest on the road at Georgia Tech.

"We're extremely excited," Patterson said Wednesday. "We've significantly upgraded both the athleticism and the skill level this season, and we're anxious to get on the court."

But for as much attention as Patterson's recruits have garnered early this preseason, it's the team's veterans that could make the most noise at Bramlage Coliseum this year.

K-State returns eight players, including 2000 Big 12 Freshman of the Year Nicole Ohlde and senior forward Kristin Rethman, who started in all but one game for the Cats last season. And while on the outside this year's team might seem very different than the 2000 squad, Rethman said one thing hasn't changed.

"It's just the same as last year," Rethman said. "We want to be competitive in the Big 12, we want to vie for the Big 12 Championship, and we want to get to the NCAA Tournament this year."

"With the girls we have in the gym, I think we're going to surprise some people this year."

"Surprise" seemed to be the word on the tip of everyone's tongue Wednesday as the media was formally introduced to this year's version of the Wildcats. With a new look, new players and the reemergence of one Laurie Koehn, Rethman said a different tone has developed at Cat workouts this fall.

"We have girls in the gym this year that are ready to play, and they're ready to compete, and they're ready to perform better than we did last year," she said.

"The talent level has definitely increased and that, in turn, has raised the level of intensity and the level of competition in the gym, so practices have been real good so far."

One reason for Rethman's optimism is the return of 2000 Preseason Freshman of the Year Laurie Koehn to the Wildcat lineup. The redshirt freshman sat out all of last season due to a preseason foot injury, an experience Koehn said was difficult to deal with.

"It was hard. It wasn't fun at all to sit on the sideline, and it was something that I had never experienced before," she said. "It was hard to feel like there was nothing you could do to contribute."

Now, Koehn is healthy and ready to contribute to the K-State attack, and for Koehn, that day couldn't come soon enough.

"I'm just excited about getting back on the court and being able to play," she said. "I just want to get back on the court and play this game, and being able to get on the court with the talent that we have this year is going to be a lot of fun."

Koehn admits that her yearlong absence may be hard to bounce back from initially, but Patterson said she's excited to have the freshman as an option again.

"Certainly when she takes the floor, she'll be taking the floor after about 12 months away from the game," Patterson said, "but I would state that a rusty Laurie Koehn is still a very good player."

Koehn will be one of many young players looking to make an early impression on K-State fans and coaches this year, however, any questions that the overall inexperience of the team might be detrimental to the Cats' play this season were answered convincingly Wednesday by Koehn.

"We're going to be young this year," she said, "but it's going to be exciting to see what we can do."

Women's basketball has high hopes for newcomers as season begins

BY BEN FEHR
Kansas State Collegian

After a disappointing 2000-01 campaign which saw K-State finish second to last in the Big 12, this year's Wildcats have reloaded and are looking to make their mark - in the Big 12 and in the NCAA as well.

With a revamped roster and the prospect of a successful season ahead, sixth year head coach Deb Patterson said she expects a growth in K-State's already supportive fan base.

"I certainly believe," Patterson said. "With the new talent we have brought in and with the product we are going to put on the floor, that people in Manhattan and the surrounding communities are going to support our program even more."

The product of K-State women's basketball might well depend on the ability of the team's highly touted freshmen to translate talent into production.

Patterson said she is ecstatic about the capabilities of her new prospects and is looking for the group to contribute right away.

"We are bringing in a very talented, new group of freshmen into this program," Patterson said. "We have significantly upgraded both the athleticism and the skill level."

Led by red-shirt freshman shooting guard Laurie Koehn, the Cats' freshman class is billed as one of the nation's best. Koehn, whose 3,160 points in high-school ranks second in Kansas prep history, was granted a medical red-shirt for a foot injury last

Cats laying physical foundation

BY SEAN PURCELL
Kansas State Collegian

Men's basketball head coach Jim Wooldridge strolled into a packed press room Wednesday to address the media about his team, he was ready for basketball.

The fire in his eyes told the media this.

Question by question was thrown at Wooldridge, most of which addressed the second-year coach's assessment of this year's team.

Wooldridge answered each one with a version of what seems to be his motto for coaching.

"We'll just have to wait and see if the things we are doing will pay off for us," he said.

One thing's for sure, though. The top priority for the Cats this year will be building a strong base for the team, Wooldridge said.

"A team needs some kind of framework underneath them before they enter the season," he said. "It comes down to knowing the offense and defense before you can concentrate on your opponents."

K-State struggled against opponents last season when the game got close. Four games were lost by five points or less.

In order to win those tight games, the Cats worked hard over the summer at becoming a more physical team.

Junior Matt Siebrandt said conditioning is one of the most important aspects of the game today.

"Training in the offseason sets the tone for practice," he said. "The harder we work now will help us on the court during the season."

Another aspect of the Cats' game that needs improvement, Wooldridge said, is the play of the perimeter. In that respect, K-State will look for senior Larry Reid to be the cornerstone of the offense.

"We need significant improvement in our guard play if we want to be successful," he said. "Larry has worked hard to put himself in a position to play well. It is important to this kid that he and the team perform well and succeed this year."

But no matter how much Reid has worked to become a leader on this year's squad, the senior is only one of 14 players who will have to step up this season, including eight newcomers, which, Reid said, make up a large part of this year's potential.

"We have some of the top players playing for us, so if I can't do it one day, I know they can get it done for us," he said. "We are just trying to do everything that needs to be done to win games this year."

Reid also will have the support of four other key returning players.

Seniors Phineas Atchison and Travis Reynolds; and juniors Quentin Buchanan and Siebrandt all will be asked to provide leadership on this year's young team.

Buchanan said it is important to display that leadership on the court because of the goals the team has set for the season.

"We have a lot of new guys, and as leaders, we have to show them the way," he said. "There are high expectations for this team and hopefully the new players can help us win those close games."

Atchison, the team's leading scorer from last year with nearly 12 points per game, said being a leader is a key to the success of this ball team.

"We try to show the younger guys it takes a lot of hard work to be successful," he said. "Once we all learn to execute this offense, everything will fall in place."

Perhaps the last key to the puzzle Wooldridge is looking for is the support of K-State fans and people in the community.

"I said it from day one, if we want to be successful, everyone plays a part," he said. "If fans want to have a great team, come fill this gym and support us because the success of the team is dictated by the crowds that add a lot of emotion to the game."

Wooldridge expresses confidence in recruits' production abilities

BY ERIKA SAUERWEIN
Kansas State Collegian

Head coach Jim Wooldridge said he's already counting on his new recruits.

That's because he has to.

The Wildcats have eight new names on the roster this fall. Four members are true freshman recruits, and three Wildcats are junior transfers who all were ranked among the Top 60 junior college players in the nation by CNNL.com.

That potential is enough to make Wooldridge optimistic this year.

"We don't have a lot of guys returning from two years ago," he said. "We don't have any choice. I just have to have confidence that these new kids are going to step up and be accounted for and do the necessary things they need to do to be productive for us. We think they will make contributions to help this ball club."

Wooldridge said the new members will help in all areas of the team. Freshman guards Marcus Hayes and Nick Williams and transfer Gilson Dejesus will bring height and more skill to the guard position. Dejesus was a junior college All-American Second Team Selection in his second season at Trinidad State in Colorado. He averaged 21.4 points a game and 44 percent from the three-point line. The new guards also will challenge Larry Reid at point guard.

"We have more versatility there right now," Wooldridge said. "If we can get better guard play, then I think that can be the most significant thing we

SOUL TUNES

Upcoming concert features 2 blues acts

BY JOE ELKINTON
Kansas State Collegian

The soulful and vibrant tradition of blues music will hit Manhattan this weekend as McCain Auditorium plays host to the All Over Blues concert.

The show, which begins at 3 p.m. Sunday, will feature The Muddy Waters Tribute Band, All Over Blues and solo artist Chris Thomas King. A combined tour is a new venture for the band and King, since the two acts have never starred alongside each other, said Susan Lamborghini of Concert Productions, LLC in California.

"We work together with Columbia Artists Management, Inc. and artists' agents to put musicians together who have never played with each other before to be able to offer something different," she said.

The Muddy Waters Tribute Band began its journey in 1993 when artists who formerly had played with Muddy Waters during the last three decades came together for a performance to mark the 10th anniversary of the legendary bluesman's death and to honor his career.

"The band has played for many, many years and everyone played with Muddy Waters at some time," said Jerry Portnoy, harmonica and vocals.

The band was nominated for a Grammy Award in 1996 for Best Traditional Blues Recording for their album, "You're Gonna Miss Me (When I'm Dead and Gone)." The Muddy Waters Tribute Band will open the show and also is made up of guitarist Luther Johnson, guitarist Bob Margolin, bassist Calvin Jones and drummer Willie Smith.

"These guys are charismatic. They have the ability to engage the audience," Richard Martin, director of McCain, said. "When you go to a concert, you want the artist to speak to you, and I think these guys do that."

King, who will perform in the show's second half, is known for his unique, new style and is reshaping the genre with his blend of blues and hip-hop influences, said Lamborghini.

He also has been praised for his recent work of traditional blues on the soundtrack for the film, "O Brother, Where Art Thou?" Audiences are looking forward to the performance, Martin said.

"Seeing how Chris Thomas King is moving blues along, and taking it into the 21st century is very exciting."

In the past, McCain has created musical programs designed to cater to all needs and preferences of the listening audience, Martin said. He said he hopes this performance, like others, is met with enthusiasm.

"The difficulty is getting K-State students to realize the opportunity they have with our programs and to persuade them that they're important," Martin said. "We try to find things that are unusual and interesting and, hopefully, we can bring in a good value to the student."

Aside from the change to blues that King has brought with his talent, and the band's revival of a legendary artist, blues also is changing the art of music, Lamborghini said. They are taking the style out of bars and clubs and crossing over to performance halls, Lamborghini said.

"Blues performances aren't usually seen in arts centers," she said. "But the art world is now realizing that the blues and jazz genre is a viable part of our culture."

The presentation will entertain as well as open the minds of those unfamiliar with the genre, bringing the heart and soul of blues to students and the public, Martin said.

"K-State offers the beginning of a good education, but there is also so much outside of the classroom," he said. "Since blues is an American art form, it is part of our heritage. If you don't know much about the blues, this is an opportunity to be informed and to arouse interest."

This is one of the most useful joke sites you will ever find. Want to make your co-workers think you're sick? This is the site to go to. It has a loop of sick sounds you can play to make people think you're under the weather, as well as an excuse generator and helpful tips for sick days. The site also has a collection of satirical news stories that are decent, but the real fun is in the site's gags.

The site is full of little gags and tricks either to amuse yourself or e-mail to your friends. So far, my favorite is the typing noises you can play while sleeping at your computer.

OUTSMART

Outsmart puts you up against the stars in a quiz show about them.

The site is a quiz show that asks you questions about your favorite celebrities while they try to outsmart you. Ever wanted to take on Eve, Shaggy or the boys from 'NSync? The site has plenty of celebrities to choose from, it's just too bad they're almost all pop stars that are more appealing to 13-year-old girls. It's surprisingly entertaining to test your knowledge on the site.

can do to improve our team. And size helps. It should help us compete better at those spots. And we have a better skill level at the guard spots right now. Shooting ability was a problem a year ago."

But the Wildcats also have added depth in the post positions. Janerio Spurlock is a transfer from Chipola Junior College in Marianna, Fla., where he averaged 20.2 points a game. Spurlock was considered the eighth best fall recruit in the Big 12. Freshman Travis Canby, a forward from Atlanta, Ga., also will provide presence in the paint.

"I want to be a role player on this team," Canby said. "I am not out there to score 20 points a game. I just want to provide the necessities for the team. Having so many new faces, I think the competition is on another level now. Even if we are freshmen, we are competing at the same level as everyone else."

But to Wooldridge, said junior Pervis Pasco is the most critical to K-State's season. Pasco, who transferred from Pensacola, Fla., was ranked among the Top 20 junior college sophomores in the nation by PrepStars.

"We need Pervis to be as good as he can be today," Wooldridge said. "We need him to play. We need him to do the things that he can do, like run the floor, block some shots and rebound. He is going to be a very important player to this team. I hate to think about him not playing well because we need him to."

Whether as a freshman or a transfer, the recruits said their transition hasn't been too difficult. "It has been a smooth transition for me," Williams said. "The discipline and hard work was instilled in me in high school. I hated the system then, but now it is in me. And I am going to be ready to play as a freshman at this level."

Pasco said he, too, is ready to play. "I want to keep everyone motivated and excited," he said.

season.

Koehn said the young athletes on the squad will be invaluable in the Cats' push for nationally recognition.

"These freshmen are really something," Koehn said. "Their athleticism and their work ethic and the way they come out and play the game is definitely going to be an asset."

The Wildcats might possess no bigger asset than freshman forward Kendra Wecker. Wecker was the Kansas Sports Hall of Fame Player of the Year in 2000-2001.

The only player in Kansas girls' prep history to score 2,000 points and pull down 1,000 rebounds in a career, Wecker said she is focusing on becoming competitive at the collegiate level.

"The transition from high school to college is incredible," Wecker said. "I am confident I can make something happen, but it is going to take a lot of hard work."

To achieve at the collegiate level, hard work must be a team commitment. Senior guard/forward Kristin Rethman, Big 12 All-Star Tour Team member in 2001, said the Cats' young players fit well into the team mentality.

"They do not play like freshmen," Rethman said. "They come in to practice ready to learn and get better. They are here to win."

Winning was something the Wildcats saw little of last season. To overcome that, K-State will rely heavily on the leadership of 2000-01 Big 12 Freshman of the Year Nicole Ohlde.

Ohlde, a 6-foot-4 center/forward, said she is excited about the possibilities the Cats' new prospects bring for the future.

"I'm so ready to get started," Ohlde said. "We can be so good. You can see it when we practice. The opportunity is there. You look around and you have to feel like it is just a matter of time."

Views clash on b-ball's future

Cats to falter in new year

Don't get me wrong. The Cats are my team, and that is not going to change anytime soon. But in the game of opposing opinion columns, there must be a negative stance.

Bear in mind this will be the one time I predict failure for any division of Wildcat athletics. Betting against your team is the athletic equivalent of letting your cell phone go off in class or shaking hands with the guy who stole your girlfriend. It's just wrong and frankly, wimpy.

That said, let's move on to the case at hand — Wildcat men's basketball and the reasons why K-State will struggle for respect in one of America's premiere conferences and in NCAA basketball as a whole this season.

I have compiled a list of seven reasons why K-State's recent round-ball shortcomings will be a continuing trend this season. Why seven? Because seven is the ultimate supreme ruler of all numbers ever devised. Disagree? Take it up with Mickey Mantle, or Steve Nash or Michael Vick, John Elway, K-State linebacker Josh Buhl for all I care. I'm right, and you know it.

Bring on the list.
1. I can take Purcell. My opinion supersedes his for this reason alone. He has height and reach, but a one-armed lemur I am not.

2. The University of Kansas. The perennial Big 12 champs rob the Cats of valuable recruiting prospects. Given the Wildcats' record against the Jayhawks in Manhattan, most Lawrence residents believe Bramlage Coliseum is, in fact, "Allen Field House West."

3. We have a good football team. Barring the talent-squandering Texas schools, a lousy football team seems to be a prerequisite for most basketball powers. Take Duke, for example — the undisputed doormat of ACC football.

4. Lousy basketball fans. Manhattan's answer to Duke's "Cameron crazies" or Florida's "rowdy reptiles" perhaps should be dubbed "the Bramlage ghosts."

5. Most K-State students consume one to five drinks when they party. There are times when you need to lie to your parents and to yourself. And there are times when you should get grinning drunk and yell obscenities at opposing basketball teams.

6. K-State basketball was sponsored by Reebok, and Reebok sucks. In order to play good, you must look good. Dress for success. I recommend Adidas, but since the Cats have switched over to Nike, I'll let this one slide.

7. History. Though possessing a rich, ragtime success story, as well as some program solidity in the '80s, Wildcat basketball has enjoyed precious little post-Cold War success. History repeats itself.

Wooldridge's team will win

For the fans who continue to sulk after each loss the football team suffers, take heart that basketball season is just around the corner.

Yes, I said the word "basketball." Most fans can't remember the glory days of K-State basketball. In fact, many elect to cowardly bash the Wildcats' recent teams in our beloved Fourum. However, for the true fans continued to cheer on the Cats through the hard times, you will be pleased to know that you are in for a treat this season.

I will let you know, though, this will not be some fluke season where the team might win more times than they lose — it might be the start of a dynasty that will rival the great teams of the past. The mastermind behind the work in progress is genius Jim Wooldridge.

A number of students will trace the history of coach Wooldridge as far back as the Chicago Bulls.

However, his success lies in the teams he has transformed from losers into winners. In 1991, coming off seven straight losing seasons, Southwest Texas hired Wooldridge in hopes of turning around a dismal program. The program rejuvenated by his third season (Wooldridge led the Bobcats to a 25-7 record), the best in school history.

His next project was at Louisiana Tech in 1994, his alma mater. Wooldridge took a team that was 2-25, and made them winners in just one season. Not even K-State was that bad when Wooldridge took over.

It seems Wooldridge only wants the best.

In doing so, he has recruited some of the most talented players in the nation to come to Manhattan, Kan. Just one of the stars fans should look at to shine this season is junior college transfer Pervis Pasco.

Post player, Pasco was ranked among the top 35 centers in the nation by Bob Ribbons All-Star Report and was also named one of the top 20 junior college sophomores in the nation by PrepStars.

Pasco, along with fellow newcomers Travis Canby, Gilson Delesus, Janerio Spurlock and Nick Williams, should all see significant time for the Cats. However, the real promise of this lies in the performance of K-State's four returning starters: Matt Siebrandt, Quentin Buchanan, Larry Reid and Travis Reynolds, as well as the teams leading scorer from a year ago Phineas Atchison.

Although the program hasn't seen the light of an NCAA tournament game since 1993, the team has potential and Wooldridge's work-in-progress should emerge as a force to be reckoned with in the Big 12.

So be prepared for a change this season. If the football team doesn't keep your interest by season's end, be ready to throw on some dancing shoes come spring-time.

Greenspan: U.S. economical outlook murky after terrorist attacks

BY JEANNINE AVERSA
The Associated Press

WASHINGTON, D.C. — The nation's economic outlook remains murky in the aftermath of the terror attacks, Federal Reserve Chairman Alan Greenspan told Congress on Wednesday.

A key ingredient of economic health — productivity — is likely to suffer in the short term, he said.

To stabilize the tottering economy, Greenspan and his Federal Reserve colleagues have cut interest rates nine times this year, with two rate reductions coming after the Sept. 11 attacks as part of an effort to bolster consumer and business confidence.

While Greenspan didn't specifically discuss the prospects for future interest rate cuts, some private economists viewed his remarks as signaling another cut was coming, probably at the Fed's next meeting Nov. 6.

In the days following the attacks on the World Trade Center and the Pentagon, Greenspan said economic activity had declined significantly. But there have been some signs of improvement since then.

"As the initial shock began to wear off, economic activity recovered somewhat from the depressed levels that immediately followed the attacks, though the recovery has been uneven," Greenspan told Congress' Joint Economic Committee.

Zero-interest financing incentives being offered by automakers had produced a sharp rebound in vehicle sales at the end of September that apparently carried over into early October, Greenspan noted.

But he said many retailers of consumer goods other than cars only have partially retraced steep drops that occurred in mid-September.

And, while air freight shipments had returned to normal, Greenspan said airlines, hotels and restaurants in tourist areas were reporting business was off from pre-attack levels.

Greenspan said more time was needed to determine how much harm the attacks will have on the economy. One loser in the short term, he said, is likely to be productivity, the amount of output per hour of work.

Increased spending on security would lead to a one-time drop in productivity, he said. But once that adjustment was made, America should return to productivity growth rates greater than the weak increases endured for the two decades before 1995.

Since 1995, annual growth rates in productivity have doubled from the preceding two decades, and this has boosted living standards.

"While productivity will take a one-time hit, Greenspan believes that the recent productivity revival will resume," Merrill Lynch economist Gerald Cohen said.

Greenspan said he was not only bullish about the long-term prospects for productivity growth but also for the overall economy.

"I think he was trying to fortify the very fragile confidence of businesses and consumers," said Mark Zandi, chief economist for Economy.com. "At the same time, he was trying to be realistic. The Sept. 11 attacks were a very significant disruption, and while the economy rebounded somewhat since then, it is not back to where it was."

Before the attacks, there were signs the economy was stabilizing after being stuck in more than a yearlong slump. Now many analysts said they believe economic fallout from the attacks have pushed the country into a recession, with economic output expected to drop in both the just-completed third quarter and the current fourth quarter.

Greenspan indicated there was a role for the government to help private insurance companies withstand a future terrorism shock. The Bush administration has offered a plan to deal with the issue.

"I think that the type of program that the administration has come up with seems to me in the right ballpark," he said.

Greenspan refused repeated attempts by committee members to be pinned down on what types of tax cuts and increased spending would be the most appropriate response to the current economic crisis.

can choose what activities to volunteer for.

"We generally ask them to try a little bit of everything," Anderson said. "Then, what they find most enjoyable, they can try."

Anderson said docents and explorers are critical to the zoo's success.

"Without docents and explorers, we wouldn't be able to do what we do," she said. "The docents and explorers are the life blood of our education department."

Wood said she plans to stay involved with the docent program until she graduates, and, she already knows what she wants to do at the end of her training.

"I'd really like to work with animals and feed them," she said. "Any chance to work with them, and I'm happy."

But as for what animals she wanted to work with, she said she didn't know.

"I just like them all," she said.

ANTHRAX

people have been exposed to or contracted anthrax, including 31 in Senate Majority Leader Tom Daschle's Washington, D.C., office.

Even more false cases or scares have been reported.

However, Lt. Richard Herrman with the K-State Police said there have been no complaints or reports of anthrax in Manhattan yet.

If people think they have come in contact with anthrax, they should immediately contact the Department of Environmental Health and Safety or the police, he said.

Hien Nguyen, sophomore in computer engineering, gets between two to three pieces of mail a week. He said he is somewhat concerned about anthrax.

"A little bit because it spreads," he said. "But Kansas is pretty far away from stuff. I would think it would spread from the outside in."

K-State biosafety officer Ron Bridges said K-State officials are trained to identify these pathogens.

"We'd rather err on side of caution," he said. "If you find a package that seems really suspicious, don't handle it. Set it down. Back away from it. Call us."

With everything going on, it still is important for people to maintain regular lives, officials said.

"There is a heightened sense of security and watchfulness, but it's business as usual," Holcomb said of the post office.

MISSIONS

Several days before the United States and Britain began airstrikes in Afghanistan on Oct. 7, a top administration official said some U.S. special operations troops had slipped in to conduct scouting missions.

While U.S. warplanes have struck targets across Afghanistan for 11 straight days, there have been indications that preparations for using Army or Air Force special operations forces are moving ahead.

Helicopter-borne special operations forces were put aboard the USS Kitty Hawk in the Indian Ocean several days ago, said officials, speaking on condition of anonymity. When the Kitty Hawk left its home port in Japan on Oct. 1, U.S. officials said it left a portion of its air wing behind. They said this indicated that the carrier might be used as a base for special operations troops.

The officials speaking Wednesday, who offered no details on the mission, cautioned against the interpretation that the troops now aboard the Kitty Hawk were necessarily about to enter combat.

President Bush, traveling to a conference in China, said the war on terrorism might take a long time.

"You mark my words: People are going to get tired of the war on terrorism. And, by the way, it may take more than two years," he said in an interview with Asian news editors.

U.S. military radio broadcasts into Afghanistan by Air Force EC-130E Commando Solo aircraft are warning the ruling Taliban they will be destroyed not only by U.S. bombs and missiles but also by American helicopters and ground troops.

"Our helicopters will rain fire down upon your camps before you detect them on radar," one message says in two of the local Afghan languages, according to transcripts provided by the Pentagon.

"Our bombs are so accurate we can drop them right through your windows. Our infantry is trained for any climate and terrain on earth. United States soldiers fire with superior marksmanship and are armed with superior weapons," the message says.

The Pentagon has not acknowledged the presence of any U.S. ground forces in Afghanistan. Officials have said for weeks that troops would be needed to root out leaders of bin Laden's al-Qaida network.

Rear Adm. John Stufflebeem, deputy director of operations for the Joint Chiefs of Staff, said Wednesday that the Taliban's air defenses are now so weak that U.S. strike aircraft are attacking with impunity.

With less concern about surface-to-air missiles, U.S. pilots are being directed to areas where U.S. war planners believe tanks and other mobile targets as well as newly discovered fixed targets such as ammunition warehouses are most likely to be found.

Airborne forward air controllers are verifying these targets and calling in strikes by Navy warplanes, Stufflebeem said.

The admiral said this did not mean there are free fire zones over Afghanistan where pilots may shoot at any military target they see. Pilots must get clearance from the forward air controller before attacking, he said.

U.S. commanders now believe Taliban air defenses have been neutralized, Stufflebeem said.

"I have not seen any reports that they are returning fire on our aircraft," he said. "Their ability to respond is falling away."

Stufflebeem described the strategy of the air campaign as forcing the Taliban to collapse from within.

"We are systematically pulling away at those legs underneath the stool that the Taliban leadership counts on to be able to exert their influence and power," he said.

Tuesday's attacks were carried out by 85 carrier-based strike aircraft such as F-14s and F/A-18s; five land-based bombers such as B-1Bs and B-52s; and fewer than five AC-130 gunships, used in Afghanistan for the first time Monday.

horizons with broadband

The truth is out there, Kansas: the future of our state depends upon the affordable, dependable delivery of advanced telecommunications services to all of our state's communities, regardless of size or location.

So, what is an "advanced telecommunications service"? It boils down to one word: Broadband — high-speed access to the Internet. If today's dial-up access is sipping information through a straw, then broadband access is like guzzling it through a firehose.

As we continue on into the Information Age, that data "guzzling" will be a necessity for growth and competitiveness in the global economy. Kansas is going to need broadband to succeed and prosper — which is why SBC Southwestern Bell is working to deliver it throughout our state.

Fortunately, several technologies for obtaining high-speed Internet access are available today, including Digital Subscriber Line (DSL), satellite and cable modem. Kansans deserve broadband access through the technology that best meets their individual needs.

Unfortunately, current laws discourage the type of investment that our telecom network needs to support widespread broadband delivery. The regulations governing service providers are inconsistent; there are different rules for different technologies — and that prevents fair and open competition.

The rules should be the same for all service providers, to foster as much competition as possible. More competition means more choices and better value for customers. And regulatory resources should be dedicated to protecting consumers, ensuring service quality and holding telecommunications companies to their promises.

With the right changes to our laws, companies will invest, broadband will flourish and Kansas will continue to grow and succeed. Together, we will prosper.

BY DEREK BOSS

Kansas State Collegian

K-State might have more than 120 players on its 2001 roster, but they're all in the same predicament this weekend.

When the Wildcats do battle with Texas A&M (5-1, 2-1) on Saturday at KSU Stadium, K-State will be trying to thwart a three-game losing streak, the team's longest since 1992.

The Cats also will be attempting to dig themselves out of the Big 12 Conference cellar — burrowed into last place with a 0-3 league mark.

And therein lies the dilemma.

Of all the players in K-State's program, none have been part of a Cat season that finished with fewer than 11 wins — and with this year's 2-3 start, such a feat is fixedly impossible this fall.

K-State seems to have stumbled into unforeseen territory, linebacker Ben Leber said — the kind of situation neither he nor anyone else ever could have expected.

"No. No. No. I mean, seriously — never," Leber said. "Never, never in my wildest dreams would I ever, ever think about anything like this ever happening. It's crazy even while we're going through it. It still doesn't seem like it's real."

"You're not prepared for it. You're not used to it. You win 11 games for the last four years, and all of a sudden — now — we've got three losses. It sure is news to me. I never foresaw it, and it's hard to take — it's hard to manage."

But manage they must, Leber said, as K-State finds itself in a must-win situation this weekend against the Aggies.

"I think it has to be," Leber said. "A win is definitely what we need to calm this thing down and get things going again. I think it's pretty evident in the last few years how we've won — through hard work and determination, always fighting hard and always feeling like we have something to prove. And I think that's more and more evident as we get to this point in the season."

"Our backs are against the wall, and we just have to keep fighting — prove to ourselves, and prove ourselves to everybody else."

Texas A&M is coming off its first loss of the season at Colorado — a game that was decided in the final minutes.

The Buffaloes' Kory Mossoni sacked Texas A&M quarterback Mark Farris, forcing a fumble, and Joey Johnson scooped up the ball and ran 52 yards for a touchdown with 58 ticks left on the clock as CU held off the Aggies, 31-21.

Meanwhile, K-State's fate at Texas Tech last weekend was decided in the final minutes as well — the final minutes of the second quarter.

Wes Welker's 60 yard touchdown reception gave the Red Raiders a 17-7 lead at the break, and Tech

Game 6: Texas A&M

Date & Time:

Saturday, 11:30 a.m.

Series: A&M leads 5-4

Facts: K-State has started conference play 0-3 for the first time since 1992. Texas A&M has bested the Wildcats in both of the last two meetings. The Cats' last win was in 1997. 1992 also marks the last time K-State failed to play in a bowl game.

cruised in the second half to hand the Cats their worst loss of the season, 38-19.

Quarterback Cliff Kingsbury and the Red Raiders racked up 475 yards of total offense — 409 passing — on the day, and averaged seven yards per play from scrimmage.

Yet, head coach Bill Snyder said the time K-State needs to correct mistakes won't preclude its preparation for the Aggies on Saturday.

"We'll spend an ample amount of time in our preparation for Texas A&M, just like we would for anyone else," Snyder said. "However, the point is well taken that in order for us to be a better football team, we have to deal from within. It's a matter of trying to find ways to either circumvent what our weaknesses are or improve upon those areas — the things that I've said all along — and that takes time."

"So, where does the time come from? You just try to create more time, I think, more than anything else, because we don't really do anything to short-change our preparation for an opponent."

Nor does Snyder want his players to approach Saturday with the wrong attitude, he said — one of complacency, carelessness or anger. Instead, they should want to get better, make the commitment and play to their full abilities.

Senior captain Aaron Lockett said he feels attitude is intact, despite the fact K-State faces the prospect of its first 0-4 start in conference play since 1989 — Snyder's very first year in Manhattan.

"I think everybody's still fighting and pulling together. We can't allow any doubters to be on the team," Lockett said.

"I'm not sure we need to regain our confidence — we just need to maybe give it a little sparkplug. I think a lot of guys definitely have confidence — not only within themselves — but in the system because it has worked before."

"But I think having confidence is one thing, and going out there and playing with confidence is something different, and that's something we definitely need to do as a team. I think one spark, one play, one situation can definitely turn this team around."

Roberson's injury causes uncertainty at quarterback

BY SEAN PURCELL
Kansas State Collegian

Reflecting on the last two weeks, one of many negative constants remain — the lack of production from K-State's offense.

In a loss to Colorado on Oct. 6, quarterback Eli Roberson led a lackluster offensive attack to defeat in a game where fans booed and called for Marc Dunn to enter the game.

People got what they wished for when Dunn showcased an unimpressive performance against Texas Tech, a game in which Roberson was sidelined due to an injury he suffered the week before. So with these variables and the probability that Roberson will be healthy for this weekend's game, the coaching staff is left with one question.

Who should start this weekend at quarterback?

Despite all other factors, offensive coordinator Ron Hudson said this decision primarily will lie in the health of Eli Roberson.

"This is a major injury, and we hope he can play for us," he said. "It's hard not knowing who is going to be there and not to make an excuse, but we really haven't had to worry about injuries in the past."

Roberson's injury and his chances of playing this weekend pose a dilemma for head coach Bill Snyder, a man who traditionally has liked to see one player at the helm of his team.

"I am probably a coach that favors one quarterback. That doesn't mean it will be that way," he said. "You do what you have to do. That is the bottom line, whether it is at quarterback or any other position."

Dunn said the team has shown a lot of effort the past few weeks, but when it comes down to it, effort hasn't gotten the victory.

"The name of the game in offense is to be as perfect as you possibly can be," he said. "When it comes down to it, you need to execute to be successful."

Last week at Texas Tech, Dunn completed 16 of 40 passes and was picked off twice. He said it is important for him to continue to improve.

"We have a motto here that you get better every day and get better in every play, and I believe that," he said.

"We have more games left than we have played thus far, so I know we can get better before this season is over."

Snyder said he was impressed by Dunn's performance last weekend against the Red Raiders. Although there are many negatives from that game, the positives, he said, are what is important to take from the loss.

"There were some things that he really didn't do well in that ballgame," he said. "That is all part of the growing up period for him, and I was pleased with the way he competed for us. Mistakes are what you have to expect from a first-timer."

A competitive fire and charisma are positives that Dunn has brought Junior quarterback Marc Dunn escapes the pocket last weekend against the Texas Tech Red Raiders. Dunn, who was filling in for an injured Eli Roberson, threw two interceptions and completed 16 of 40 passes. The junior is expected to start Saturday if Roberson's injury hasn't healed.

Ailing line looks for consistency

BY MICHAEL NOLL
Kansas State Collegian

Team performance and individual recognition do not always go hand in hand for the offensive line.

K-State's offensive line gave up six quarterback sacks against Colorado, and the team managed 196 yards of total offense.

As a result of those statistics, the coaches did not name an offensive player of the week.

But if the coaches expected that move to light a fire under the team, their hopes were dashed one week later in Lubbock, Texas.

Against Texas Tech, the Cats nearly repeated the performance by allowing five sacks and amassing 343 yards of offense.

This time two offensive players of the week were named, and one was a lineman — sophomore Nick Leckey.

That honor is perhaps odd considering that for the second week in a row, the offensive line failed to reach its goals of 200 yards both in passing and rushing.

Nonetheless, Leckey still deserved the award, head coach Bill Snyder said.

"Nick probably didn't play any different than he has during the course of the year. He just plays hard, goes out and flies around. He's a competitor — just competes snap after snap after snap," Snyder said. "I don't think he graded out any higher than he normally does. Just the intensity with which he plays, I think, is what is always impressive about Nick."

The fact that the performance against Texas Tech wasn't completely bleak doesn't necessarily help the offensive line, though. Injuries across the line are forcing players to play different positions each game, and at times, each quarter.

— One player, tackle Thomas Barnett, is out for the season with an injury.

"It took away your most experienced football player," offensive line coach Paul Dunn said. "Here's a guy who had three years of playing experience."

"It made us make some moves early. That's where the shuffling started."

Wildcats look for answers in kicking game; Brite, Rheem could see time against A&M

BY MICHAEL NOLL
Kansas State Collegian

After six missed extra-point attempts by four different kickers, K-State might have reached its final personnel option.

"I may do it," head coach Bill Snyder joked Tuesday at the weekly press conference.

Even Snyder's range might not be much better than the K-State kickers.

"It's about the same as the rest," he said.

The reality remains that the Cats have made 60 percent of their PAT attempts and 40 percent of their field goal attempts. Those statistics are frustrating not only for the coaches but for the kickers as well.

"It's hard for all of us because we're around each other all day. We work with each other all day," Jared Brite said after the Texas Tech game. "No matter who's in there, we want them to succeed. And right now, it's not happening for us, and it's making everybody a little antsy, a little nervous and kind of pissing people off, I guess you could say."

For now, though, Brite said there is not a clear solution to the problem.

"It's actually hard to say," he said. "I couldn't tell you specifically. I don't know."

The problem at least doesn't lie with the holder Mike Ronsick, a backup punter who also held on kicks all of last season. In fact, having a punter hold for kicks is an ideal situation, Snyder said.

"We always like to have punters hold, if indeed you can, because they have a chance to work together more frequently," he said.

"They can work together all day, really."

Ronsick traditionally has had good chemistry with the kickers.

"There does need to be chemistry. Two guys can hold the ball the same way, and the kicker will say, 'That's got to be my holder, the other one,' and there's no difference in the hold," Snyder said. "Mike's been a good holder for us."

While Snyder doesn't make excuses for his team's poor kicking, he said kickers have much less room for error than other players. A quarterback, for instance, can release the ball badly, and the receiver will be able to go make a catch.

Kickers have to hit the ball dead on to be successful, he said.

"You take a placekicker or a punter, and you drop the ball or hit the ball off the tee a quarter of an inch from where it needs to be hit, then you're going to fail, or at least you're not going to succeed in what you're attempting to do," Snyder said. "And everybody in the country sees it, and everybody thinks, 'Somebody should shoot that young guy.' And that's not the case."

"It is really a hard skill, either one of those, punting or kicking."

Hard skill or not, someone needs to master kicking for the Cats, and against Texas A&M, that person won't be Brite, who might handle kickoffs but still can't kick field goals or PAT's because of a leg injury.

Another option could be true freshman Joe Rheem. Originally, the plan was for Rheem to redshirt while Brite kicked, but due to Brite's injury, that plan could change, Snyder said.

"Now that Jared is not, the thought is if Joe gets himself prepared and is ready to kick, then we'll certainly allow him to enter into the mix," Snyder said.

"I said last week he was getting closer — he wasn't close enough — but he's getting a lot closer. And it's possible, depending on his week of practice, that he could be on the field."

Faggins makes most of time in secondary

BY DEREK BOSS

Kansas State Collegian

K-State did more Nov. 20, 1999, than still Missouri, 66-0.

The Wildcats put an air-tight seal on cornerback DeMarcus Faggins' decision to don the purple and white.

On that winter day, Faggins — then a sophomore at Navarro (Tex.) Community College — made an important visit to Manhattan, and K-State was out to impress.

Faggins was treated to breakfast at President Jon Wefald's house on campus and was introduced to various Wildcat constituents throughout the day.

Those first impressions, coupled with a convincing victory at KSU Stadium that afternoon, were more than enough to lure Faggins from the Lone Star State.

Besides, his connection to K-State didn't start there.

Jim Bennett, brother of Cat defensive coordinator Phil Bennett, was Faggins' head coach at Irving High School.

"He fell in love with him," Phil said of Jim's relationship with Faggins, "and he kept telling me. I kept hearing it."

"He goes, 'Hey, we've got this kid, DeMarcus Faggins, and you're going to recruit him someday. You're going to recruit him someday.'"

But Faggins didn't attend much school as a freshman, Bennett said, as he continued to grieve the death of his mother during the eighth grade.

"That was a lot of transition in his life," Bennett said, "and Jim sort of helped him get on track. He told me, 'I want you to just tell him that wherever you're at, you'll recruit him when he comes out of junior college, 'cause he's going to have to go to junior college.'"

Bennett did. "I told him, 'I'll come back and get you wherever I'm at,'" he said. "And I was one of quite a few that wanted to come back and get him."

In fact, out of the junior college ranks, Faggins was recruited by several other Division I-A schools, including Colorado, Nebraska, Tennessee and Texas.

But the events of Nov. 20 were icing on the cake, and Faggins felt Bennett and K-State were the right fit.

Now, less than two years later, Faggins has played in all 19 games since his arrival in Manhattan, counting all five this season as one of the Cats' two starting cornerbacks.

Faggins leads the team in interceptions with four, snatching two last weekend at Texas Tech, and he ranks seventh with 23 tackles (20 solo). He's also notched one forced fumble and four pass breakups on the year.

Senior cornerback DeMarcus Faggins picks off Colorado quarterback Craig Ochs two weeks ago at KSU Stadium. Faggins leads the Big 12 in interceptions with four this season.

Those kind of efforts have left Faggins' name echoing over P.A. systems quite regularly this season, or his last name, at least. His first name never touches the gridiron.

"It's just Petey," linebacker Ben Leber said. "It's Petey all the time."

Faggins said he'll never outgrow the nickname, given to him by his grandmother at a very early age, though he still isn't quite sure how he got it.

"For some reason, she'd tell me I had a ring around my eye," Faggins said. "I have no clue. But I liked to watch the 'Little Rascals,' and the dog on the 'Little Rascals' had a ring around his eye and his name was Petey, so that's where I got it from."

"Really it doesn't matter to me. All my friends call me Petey, and then when it comes to school and things, it's DeMarcus."

Whatever the name, though, his effort on the field is unwavering, Leber said. Faggins might have entered the offseason behind Terence Newman and DeRon Tyler on the depth chart at cornerback, but he didn't let that stop him.

"In my mind, I was like, 'Well, I want to be the starter,'" Faggins said. "So during winter conditioning, I worked hard to gain weight, get faster and be more physical."

"Then, coming out this year, I just wanted to show the coaches that I can be one of the starters, and to get everybody to believe in me and trust me out there on the field. It's kind of like a dream come true. It's an honor to be a starter at Kansas State."

Leber said he wasn't surprised at Faggins' emergence, however. He had been showing all the signs during his junior season, and by last summer, everything began to fall into place.

"I remember telling Coach Bennett during summer camp how well Petey had been doing," Leber said. "Everybody was just excited. I think he had an interception every day that we had camp. We've had great expectations for him, and he's fulfilling them far beyond what we had."

"The sky's the limit for Petey." And with over a 40-inch vertical jump, that sky isn't too far from Faggins' reach.

"In practice, he's going hard and making plays, and a lot of guys can just see his determination and his focus," Leber said.

"He doesn't have to go out and jaw-jack and try to get in people's heads. He's going to go out there, line up against you and just try to kick your ass."

Attitude, responsibility top linebacker's goals

BY ERIKA SAUERWEIN

Kansas State Collegian

Senior Ben Leber never envisioned being K-State's starting linebacker as a sophomore. He never set out to be a captain for the Wildcats. And he certainly never imagined the Wildcats would be 0-3 in Big 12 conference play this season.

But the South Dakota native said he is sure about one thing right now.

"I go out there with the attitude to get the job done," he said. "There are a lot of responsibilities and a lot of things that need to get done on the field more than just how to get the ball or cover pass plays or run plays. My attitude is just 'get it all done,' and that's how I go out every time."

Regardless of K-State's record, individually, Leber has been getting it done. The 6-foot-4, 250-pound senior is tied for second on the team with 30 tackles and leads the team with 2.5 sacks. Leber had a team-high 10 tackles against Texas Tech last weekend.

With a 2-3 record, K-State is in a position that's new to everyone on the roster, and it has left the senior with some unanswered questions.

"The seniors are just as confused as everybody else," Leber said. "We have never been here before. I never imagined being in this position. I don't think any player in the country imagines being in a position like this. You always go into the season with a positive attitude to win all your games. It is tough on everybody."

But teammates and coaches said they haven't seen Leber falter. Despite the loss to Texas Tech, defensive coordinator Phil Bennett said Leber took control in last week's game.

"Last week, Ben didn't play perfect, but he responded last week, (especially with) special teams," Bennett said. "His 'want to' is there. And he has got to realize that he can't do it all by himself, but he can be a major contributor."

Co-captain Aaron Lockett said the senior's strong attitude makes younger members of the team look to Leber for leadership.

"Ben is a guy who is out there giving 110 percent," Lockett said.

File photo by Matt Stamey/Collegian

Senior linebacker Ben Leber sacks Texas Tech's Cliff Kingsbury last year at KSU Stadium.

"You can see it in the way he makes plays and in his face. He is a guy who has definitely made a difference in this program over the last four years."

"The seniors have definitely put ourselves in a position throughout the years to go out there to lead the younger guys in the direction they need to be lead. Ben and I have been here five years," he said.

"We have been through the good times and the great times, and now we are kinda struggling. We just got to keep the mind set that things will be all right and the young guys will follow."

Leber, however, doesn't quite see himself as the leader teammates say he is.

"I really don't feel that everyone looks to me as the leader," he said. "Maybe I am just blind or maybe I just don't want to see it, but it is one of those things that I am grateful for. Grateful that they do see me as a leader and as the guy to look up to, and I appreciate all that, but I don't walk around like everyone looks to me. It is a nice compliment and a nice position to be in. But I never thought I would be in this position coming into this program."

Leber redshirted his first year in and saw action in every game as a freshman, including a start against Iowa State replacing the injured Jeff

Cats' season changes; K-State will prevail

Well, if last Saturday at Texas Tech was our biggest game of the 2001 season — like I said in last week's column — then K-State just did a swan dive into an empty pool.

Guess we can add neck injuries to the Cats' list of ailments, as if they haven't had enough already.

But seriously, it just seems like nothing can go right for the Wildcats this season. It's been a year to expect the unexpected. Even Cheech and Chong found a way to pass their drug test before the Colorado game. I mean, what are the odds of that? C'mon. I still think that had to be rigged somehow.

Still, sitting dead last in the Big 12 with an 0-3 league record, K-State is desperately looking for answers.

On Tuesday, coach Bill Snyder said, jokingly, that he has considered taking over field goal and extra point responsibilities for the team this weekend.

Joking or not, I say we at least give him a shot. Heaven knows how many times Wade Waltman and Kyle Altvater's kicks have hooked this year. Heck, I'd keep my eyes peeled for a flyin' Nike football even if I was sitting "safely" in the stands on either 10-yard line.

But in all fairness to these guys — they're no Martin Gramatica or Jamie Rheem. They don't have the talent or experience to be even somewhat comparable, and we shouldn't expect them to be spittin' images (though they could jump up and down after making an extra point for old times sake, but then again, I guess that would only be 60 percent of the time, huh?).

K-State just doesn't seem to look like the team we've all grown to love. Something's missing, and it's hard to pinpoint what it is. Obviously, Snyder has no clue, or the wizard himself would have fixed things by now.

Don't quote me on it, but I think it's all in the team's mentality.

The Cats played a great game at Oklahoma on Sept. 29, posting a raging comeback before falling 38-37, and frankly, they let it get to their heads. They played so well against a Top-5 opponent — surely they wouldn't need to exert that much effort on their home turf against then-unranked Colorado?

But K-State found its mistake in that approach, and the Buffs spanked the Cats 16-6 to send their season into a downward spiral — one that culminated in last week's 38-19 defeat at the hands of Texas Tech.

Yes, we lost to Tech — the same Red Raider team that KU beat the week prior. Now, that's just pathetic.

I have to say, though, I'm confident the Cats will rebound this week against Texas A&M. It's a must-win game for K-State, and the seniors will get their team ready to play.

Just talking to several of the captains at Tuesday's press conference, it seems the team still has a fairly positive attitude. They know their season's not over, and it's not typical of Snyder's program for the Cats to lay down.

Besides, A&M quarterback Mark Farris is old enough to be my dad, and I think the Cat defense will get pressure on him early. He won't be able to sustain too many big hits with his fragile bones, and I look for d-tackle Tank Reese and Co. to finally make their presence felt inside.

It'll be about time for K-State's front four, who have really failed to play to their potential through five games in 2001. They're a big reason why teams like Tech throw for over 400 yards on us. I'm not saying our defensive backs are flawless, but without any pressure on the passer, any QB could pick us apart eventually. It just takes time.

But in all actuality, I really think the Cats have an edge this weekend. The Aggies may have been a nemesis for the purple recently, downing K-State last year in College Station, as well as in the 1998 Big 12 Championship game — but that'll all change in two days.

Watch for a big day from QB Marc Dunn, who I predict will make his second consecutive start. Roberson could probably go, but I'm sure that ankle injury would impede his performance. Also, look for the return of Darren Sproles to the lineup, as Snyder said the chances are good that the true freshman will be available.

K-State needs a spark right now, and Sproles might be the answer.

Either that, or I'm sure Snyder kicking extra points during pregame warm-ups will get a few people fired up.

A&M ready for win over derailed team

Two teams looking to get back on track will do battle Saturday, but luckily for Texas A&M, K-State might already have been derailed.

Three weeks ago, the Wildcats, then ranked No. 11 in the nation, took on Oklahoma and gave the Sooners all they could handle.

The one-point loss to the Sooners might have been the push that sent the Wildcats down the stairs to the basement of the Big 12 North.

Losing to Oklahoma, Colorado and Texas Tech gives K-State an 0-3 conference record, ending any shot the team has at winding up in Dallas for the Big 12 Championship game.

A&M, who came into last weekend's matchup at No. 25, came just one play short of upsetting the Buffaloes. The Aggies were driving with less than two minutes left and were on the verge of regaining the lead for good before junior quarterback Mark Farris' fumble was returned by the Buffs for a 52-yard game-clinching score.

K-State was dismantled by Texas Tech quarterback Cliff Kingsbury, who passed for 409 yards and leads the Big 12 in total yards.

K-State will see the same passing frenzy from the Big 12's No. 2 passing quarterback Farris, who is coming off a 334-yard performance against the Buffaloes. The Wildcat secondary should be busy, because of the Aggies' problems with the running game last week and the strong play of the Wildcat run defense.

A determined offensive line should keep Farris protected from the Wildcat pass rush, which was without Melvin Williams for the past two weeks, one of their top returning pass rushers from the 2000 season.

Farris also has two solid targets that have established themselves in the last few weeks.

Sophomore transfer Jamaar Taylor has been Farris' big-play receiver so far in 2001. Taylor caught two touchdown passes in the second quarter of the Aggies' loss to the Buffaloes. Both touchdown receptions came on third down, one from 64 yards and one from five yards out.

Freshman receiver Terrence Murphy has also been a favorite target of Farris, pulling down 18 catches for 312 yards this season.

The Aggies will need to reestablish their running attack to compliment Farris' aerial assault. A&M rushed for just 42 yards against the Buffaloes.

Wildcat quarterback Eli Roberson, or even Marc Dunn, should see plenty of junior linebacker Jarrod Penright, who should be unleashed against the Wildcat passing attack. Penright, who leads the Big 12 in both sacks (9) and tackles-for loss (12), was held back to protect the pass against the Buffaloes and should be anxious to get into the backfield and destroy whoever will call the signals for the Wildcats.

Penright should have a field day, as did the Tech defense against the Wildcats, who tallied five sacks against an offensive line missing senior Matt Martin, who happens to be on Penright's side.

A&M boasts a 5-4 series lead over the Cats. The Wildcats were expected to come into Kyle Field last season and redeem their 1993 loss but looked mediocre despite their No. 10 ranking.

K-State does have the advantage of being in the friendly confines of KSU Stadium, but Wildcat fans have shown just how friendly they can be when things are not going so well for the Wildcats.

During their loss to the Buffaloes in Manhattan, KSU faithfully booed their Wildcats, and the players will remember that when the Aggies come to town Saturday.

All it will take is a long connection from Farris to set the fires under the "bon-birds" at KSU, and that may end the Wildcats' hopes at salvaging the win, and possibly the season.

If the Aggies continue their success through the air, rediscover their running game and contain Josh Scobey and the speedy Aaron Lockett, the Aggies will get back on the winning track and keep the Wildcats in the Big 12 cellar.

OFFENSE

to the team so far, senior wideout Aaron Lockett said. Solid performance and progress only can be made with game experience.

"Game experience is something that every person needs when they come into a new system," he said. "I feel he will get that experience. He will develop into the player that people expect him to be."

Lockett said a key for this offense is playing a cleaner style of football. Penalties cost K-State several opportunities to make plays. For Dunn, all these things go under the category of "little things."

"You never worry about the big things because when you worry about taking care of the little things, that builds into taking care of the big things," he said. "The little things are the most important, especially right now because we have to become more fundamentally sound so we can make those big plays and become the team we are capable of becoming."

People can't just pin-point the offense as the core problem with the team, Snyder said. It is important that all facets of the team get better.

"It is hard for anyone to say one side is the problem. It's just hard to assess it that way," he said. "Our philosophy is the defense needs to hold the opponent to less points than our offense scores, and the offense needs to score more points than the opponent does. If you win 49-48, everyone accomplishes their goal, and if it is the other way around, then nobody accomplishes their goal. It's a team concept because it is a team game."

A strong second half of the season will show the team's determination and heart, Lockett said. The key is not to dwell on the past.

"We have the caliber and fire on this offense to get things done for us," he said. "The first half of the season is gone. We just have to focus on the second half."

Success in the second half starts with understanding what the team has done wrong, Hudson said.

"We have to get back to where we are accustomed to going," he said. "We understand there are problems, but we need to get back to where our players are succeeding and negate the mistakes we are making."

In the end, Dunn said, it all will come down to executing.

"We have a long way to go to be the team we want to be," he said. "Talking about it won't get it done, we have to get it done, period."

Kelly. In that game, he had a season-high 10 tackles with five of them for a loss and had two pass breakups.

Leber said he still gets nervous thinking about his first games as a Wildcat.

"I never saw myself as starting linebacker so soon," he said. "I was pushing the role. And then, when Jeff Kelly got hurt, before I knew it, they were taking the pacifier out and sticking me on the field. I was a wreck. I don't think I did anything right. I just ran around and forgot about all my responsibilities, and once the ball was snapped, I got a few tackles, but I still don't know how I got those."

his leg against Texas Tech, and his return for the Texas A&M game is uncertain.

Injuries cannot provide an excuse for the offensive line, though. Younger players have to perform in the absence of Barnett, Martin and Robertson.

"The bottom line is, you're only as good as your depth, and if one kid goes down, another kid's got to step up," Dunn said.

The process of substitution for injured players is not totally random.

The coaches do have contingency plans for injuries.

"It's not like a mass-substitution thing where we're coming out and we're trying to substitute guys in freely," Dunn said. "That's not the case."

Every player on the offensive line depth chart will have to be ready to play against Texas A&M. Still, with the offensive's recent woes, Dunn said he hopes to find five players who can play their positions from start to finish.

"We're going to roll our sleeves up," Dunn said, "and we're going to line up with five guys out there that want to get after it and get it done."

settle for complacency.

"We still have half of a season in front of us," Leber said. "The seniors have had talks and have tried to get a feel for everything. I don't know how I am doing or if they are responding. But we know how we did stuff in the past and how we won games and how we were successful. We still need to play with a sense of pride."

K-State testing powder

BY SARAH BAHARI

A white, powdery substance was discovered Friday morning near faculty mailboxes on the second floor of Throckmorton Hall.

Preliminary tests to determine what the substance is and whether it is harmful will be completed today.

"I don't believe that this will turn out to be anything," said Steve Galitzer, associate director of public safety. "One — we didn't find any other evidence, and two — there was no threat to anyone."

It is more likely that the substance was something spilled by someone, Galitzer said. No one has reported doing so yet.

If it was a hoax, the people responsible will be punished, he said.

"I hope no one would play a joke in such poor taste," he said. "We take these things just as seriously as the actual threat."

The public safety office also has received calls regarding people's suspicious mail, but Galitzer said the reports turned out to be nothing.

Fort Riley has responded to half a dozen reports regarding suspicious mail. So far, all reports have turned out to be false.

Nationwide, thousands of reports have been made, but just more than 50 of those people actually have been exposed to or contracted anthrax.

Still, people should be cautious, Galitzer said.

"If you find something, throw it away," he said. "Avoid any contact with it."

Red Cross blood drive ready for donors

BY APRIL MIDDLETON
Kansas State Collegian

Since the Sept. 11 tragedy, people have been encouraged to wait to give blood until a blood drive came to their community.

K-State students don't have to wait anymore.

The annual blood drive, sponsored by K-State and the American Red Cross, begins today and runs through Friday.

"We just want to make sure everyone has a place to donate blood," said Nancy Powell, supervisor of donor resources development. "It's a matter of convenience, and students are very busy. This makes it easy for them."

Stacey

Huerter, student coordinator, said the goal for this year's drive is 965 units. The goal for previous semesters has been 850 units.

Huerter said, however, this year's goal should not be difficult to meet.

"American Red Cross blood drives have seen much higher than usual numbers across the country since the tragedy," Huerter said. "People everywhere want to get out and donate. This is K-State students' chance."

Eligible donors must be at least 17 years

Plans finalized to seize bin Laden

BY PAULINE JELINEK
The Associated Press

WASHINGTON, D.C. — U.S. commandos are prepared to use deadly force on Osama bin Laden, the nation's top general said Sunday, as the Pentagon pressed its bombing and covert ground campaign to hunt down America's No. 1 terrorist suspect.

Opening a third week of air strikes, U.S. warplanes hit north of the capital, Kabul. And Afghan officials reported air attacks Sunday around the western city of Herat, Kandahar, in the south and the front line positions near the city of Mazar-e-Sharif.

AMERICA RESPONDS

Secret missions by special operations forces also were continuing, two defense officials said on condition of anonymity. They gave no details.

Also Sunday, the Pentagon released the names of two Rangers killed in a helicopter crash over the weekend, the first acknowledged combat deaths in the campaign.

Asked whether U.S. forces would kill bin Laden on sight, Gen. Richard B. Myers, chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, said it depends on what happens when he's found.

"If it's a defensive situation, then bullets will fly. But if we can capture somebody, then we'll do that," he said on ABC's "This Week."

Asked the same question, Secretary of State Colin Powell told CNN's "Late Edition": "Our mission is to bring him to justice or bring justice to him."

President Bush signed an order last month directing the CIA to destroy bin Laden and his communications, security apparatus and infrastructure in retaliation for the Sept. 11 World Trade Center and Pentagon attacks, a senior administration official said Sunday.

Bush also added more than $1 billion to the spy agency's war on terrorism, most of it for the new covert action.

The U.S.-led military campaign already has crippled terrorists' bases and their ability to train in Afghanistan, Myers said.

"They won't be doing any training in the near future in Afghanistan," he said.

Myers said the fight against the ruling Taliban regime and bin Laden's al-Qaeda terrorist network is "a war we must win if we want to maintain our freedom."

The aerial bombing began Oct. 7, followed by the first publicly acknowledged ground assaults Saturday.

In lightning strikes under cover of darkness, 100 airborne Army Rangers and other special forces hit a Taliban-controlled airfield and a residence of Taliban leader Mullah Mohammed Omar near the southern city of Kandahar. They destroyed a cache of weapons, killed an undetermined number of

Event gives audience chance to sample wine

BY MICHAEL WATSON

Europeans have been making wines for centuries, Doug Ackley said.

In America, wine making is a little newer.

Consumers and aficionados swirled, sniffed, sipped and tasted 200 European and American wines Sunday at the Third Annual Flint Hills Festival of Wines at the Houston Street Ballroom.

European wines have a little earthier tone, Ackley, K-State assistant controller, said. When drinking American wines, one can taste a little more grape. Ackley and his wife have visited California wine country, and he said he is looking for variety.

"We've had some of these wines before," Ackley said. "We're concentrating on the ones we haven't had. We went through and tasted the white ones first. You don't want to ruin your palette. Now we're going to go through and taste the red wines."

The wine festival raised more than $67,000 for the Homecare & Hospice Foundation, which enables clients to live at home while preserving dignity. Independence and self-determination. The foundation provides support to uninsured or underinsured families within 25 miles of Manhattan.

Cheryl Raborn, Manhattan resident, took her husband to the wine festival for his birthday and said her husband makes his own wine.

"This is a chance to taste some different kinds," she said. "I think it's for an extremely good cause. Hospice is one of those services that most people need at some time."

Beverly Moore, director of development for Standard Beverage Corporation, the founder and events title sponsor, said education is the focus of the afternoon. The main topic of education is how to pair food and wine.

"People won't read it while they're here. But if they take it home and read it, they will learn about how to be safe. This is the first year we've ever sold out," she said.

"We're thrilled."

The goal for this year's wine festival is $42,000. Funds were raised through ticket sales and a silent auction.

"A committee of people went out to solicit donations from businesses," said Judine Mesceri, social services coordinator for Homecare & Hospice. "Most are from Manhattan, but others are from all over."

There were 115 items on the silent auction block. Items included an autographed Martin Gramatica jersey, a 6.0L bottle of 1997 Montevina Amador County Zinfandel, Pleasurable Pursuits picnic basket including his and her wisdom books, Nature's Retreat compact discs, two wine glasses and a 750 ml bottle of 1994 Benziger Sonoma County Merlot and other donations.

Jennifer Schroeder, Manhattan resident, said she wanted the tickets to the wine festival in Kansas City area. She said that for fun, she bid on five or six things.

"This was our first wine tasting," she said. "We're very impressed with the wines we've tasted and the food we've tasted."

Little Apple Brewing Company, Manhattan Country Club, Ristorante Marco Polo and Capers Café & Bakery also sponsored the event.

"It's a good way for them to advertise," said Vera Hintz, executive director of Homecare & Hospice. "It's a donation out of the good of their hearts."

Tony Richardson, chef for Capers Café & Bakery, demonstrated how to cook with wine. He prepared shrimp scampi over scallion cous-cous, a middle-eastern pasta.

"Scampi is straight forward," he said. "It's basic — easy to do, and everybody loves it."

Richardson also demonstrated how to prepare duck a la orange, over a sweet potato polenta, with julienne vegetables and plum banana salsa. He said it is a much more elaborate main course.

"This is stuff you can do at home," he said. "That's why we do the demos in cake pans. We always try to gear it to where

KU drinking citations up since tailgating changes

LAWRENCE — Underage drinking citations near the University of Kansas campus have exploded ten-fold since the school legalized drinking during pre-game tailgating at Memorial Stadium.

"There's definitely been an increase," said Jo Hardesty, director of the University's Legal Services for Students.

Police know there are big groups of people who live right around the campus who are underage.

The number of underage drinkers cited near the first two home football game days shot up more than 10 times last season's average — from about 2.5 per game day to 23 and 25, according to Lawrence Municipal Court and state Alcoholic Beverage Control statistics.

Only about 25 percent of those citations were written in parking lots where tailgating is allowed. Most of the offenders were caught in campus-area neighborhoods populated by students.

Hardesty said she didn't think the tailgating policy had spurred more illegal consumption, but she's sure police and Alcoholic Beverage Council agents are cracking down harder.

"They know there's a big party on campus," she said. "They know there's alcohol there. They know there's underage people there. They figure there's probably going to be underage drinking."

Columbine victims suing drug maker for damages

DENVER — Families of five Columbine High School shooting victims are suing the maker of an anti-depressant that one of the student gunmen was taking when he opened fire.

A therapeutic amount of the drug Luvox was found in Eric Harris' system after he died, the Jefferson County coroner's office has said.

Solvay Pharmaceuticals Inc. makes the drug to treat obsessive-compulsive disorder and depression.

The lawsuit filed Friday in U.S. District Court claims Solvay failed to warn Harris' doctor about side effects.

"Such drugs caused Eric Harris to become manic and psychotic," the lawsuit states.

Solvay's Web site warns that the drug might impair judgment, thinking or motor skills.

The American Psychiatric Association defended Luvox in 1999, saying a decade of research found little relationship between the use of antidepressants and destructive behavior.

Harris and Dylan Klebold killed 12 students and a teacher and wounded 26 people before taking their own lives April 20, 1999.

The plaintiffs are seeking damages in excess of $75,000 each.

New York concert honors city's resiliency in tragedy

NEW YORK — Paul McCartney, David Bowie, Elton John and Billy Joel joined other performers Saturday in a "Concert for New York," which served as a benefit for the city while celebrating its resiliency in a time of crisis.

Bowie kicked off the concert with a poignant rendition of Paul Simon's "America," then rocked a crowd that included thousands of firefighters, police officers and rescue workers with the appropriately titled "Heroes."

"It's an absolute pleasure to play for you tonight," Bowie told the crowd at "Concert for New York," which was broadcast from Madison Square Garden live on VH1.

Despite the tragic circumstances that led to the concert, the star-studded event was anything but somber — instead, it was a raucous celebration.

One of the biggest ovations was reserved for the 6,000 firefighters, police officers and rescue workers honored for their heroic efforts in the Sept. 11 attack on the World Trade Center.

"Tonight is dedicated to you," comedian Billy Crystal said as the crowd roared its approval.

CAMPUS Post Card

Michael Anness and Loren Roberts

Having a passion for engineering is something Michael Anness and Loren Roberts, seniors in mechanical engineering, share.

Roberts and Anness both have the nuclear option and have received numerous scholarships, including the American Nuclear Society and the National Academy for Nuclear Training merit-based scholarships. Both are also members of Alpha Nu Sigma and Tau Beta Pi engineering honoraries.

"I'm lucky to have found a field that I have a passion for," Anness said. "It's easy to do well in a subject that you're interested in."

Roberts said he, too, is motivated to succeed because of his interest in his field.

"I enjoy learning about nuclear power and all of its intricacies," Roberts said.

Roberts said time management has been his biggest challenge, while Anness said working at K-State's TRIGA Reactor has tested his limits the most.

Anness, who received $6,750 in scholarships, already has accepted a job doing reactor core design after he graduates in May. Roberts will attend graduate school and pursue his career in nuclear engineering.

Unitarian-Universalist Campus Outreach.

The Unitarian-Universalist Fellowship of Manhattan announces the formation of a UU Campus Outreach to the KSU community.

Who are UUs?

The Unitarian-Universalist Association has no creed, prophet, or sacred blood. We need on Sunday mornings as a community to express our individual beliefs and religious convictions. The UU Fellowship of Manhattan (www.linithill.com/~uufellow) belongs to the Unitarian-Universalist Association (www.uua.org) and to the Prairie Star District of the UUA.

What do UUs believe?

UUs strongly believe in and affirm the following seven principles: 1) the inherent worth and dignity of every person; 2) justice, equity, and compassion in human relations; 3) acceptance of one another and encouragement to spiritual growth in our congregation; 4) a free and responsible search for truth and meaning; 5) the right of conscience and the use of the democratic process within our congregations and society at large; 6) the goal of world community with peace, liberty, and justice for all; 7) respect for the interdependent web of all existence of which we are a part.

When do UUs meet on campus?

The UU Campus Outreach will meet on Tuesday, October 23, from 7:30 - 9:00 p.m. at the Student Center (iv room) of the Ecumenical Campus Ministry at 1021 Denison. The first meeting will be organizational in nature with music and a time to discuss the goals of the group. Rev. David Grimm, our minister, will speak about the UU seven principles. Another meeting will be held at the same place and time on Tuesday, October 30.

Revival Services will be held at the 1st Church of the Nazarene at 3031 Kimball Ave. October 21-24.
The time of services are Sunday, 10:40 a.m. & 6:00 p.m.
Monday-Wednesday, 7:00 p.m.

The speaker will be Evangelist Robert Dabydeen, a former Hindu Priest and District Superintendent in Guyana. To lead worship will be Song Evangelist Larry Dodds.

Deadlines for summer internships near

BY KECIA N. SEYB
Kansas State Collegian

Deadlines for turning in applications for summer internships are approaching quickly.

"They're coming soon," said Kristy Morgan, coordinator of experiential learning for Career and Employment Services. "It just depends on the internships. Some will be February or March, but some are sooner."

To ensure they get their applications in on time, students need to be locating which internships they definitely are interested in and making sure they're not missing deadlines, Morgan said.

"They need to get their résumés ready, be building a network and know how they're going to go about their search," she said.

Different items are required for different internships, she said, including a résumé, cover letter, sometimes transcripts and writing samples for journalism or English majors.

"Résumé and cover letter are pretty much standard," she said.

Starting their internship search, students can talk to professors or to people they know who already are working, Morgan said. She said the CES Web site, www.ksu.edu/ces, has about 150 internships listed that those who are registered with CES can view. She said other students can come into the office and look too.

Morgan said she recommends that students send out six to 10 applications for different internships.

"Understanding that some they won't get offered, and some they won't want," she said. "If they can, apply to more."

Not all students need internships, she said, but some majors require them, such as sociology, family studies and human services, hotel and restaurant management and golf course management.

She said that last year, 93 percent of engineering graduates had internships.

Jack Fry, professor of horticulture with a specialty in golf course management, helps golf course management majors find internships. He said a combination of a résumé and a telephone call to the employer usually leads to an internship.

For majors in his area, they have an association — Golf Course Superintendents Association of America — that has a Web site with listings of all internships, of which most of the students are members.

"If a student is in tune and active with CES and GCSAA," he said, "they will have all their bases covered."

Mock interviews that CES sponsors in early November often lead to internships, Fry said.

It also is imperative that students do their research about their employers, he said, and try to find the best internship, not necessarily the best place.

"It's not always the most prestigious, private golf course that's going to have the best internship," he said.

"Sometimes they can get lost in the crowd there."

He said students probably want to find out whether a course has 18 holes, what the salary of the internship is and whether the employer provides housing.

In some cases, he said, the employer will provide a meal a day.

One of his students interned in the Rockies in Colorado with good hourly wages and housing, he said. Another one worked on Nantucket Island, off the coast of Massachusetts.

"There are all sorts of opportunities if they look and do their research," he said.

Morgan also said students need to research possible internships.

Top five strategies for landing your dream job

1. Get experience

Students who have some sort of related experience always shine more than others. This experience can include school activities, volunteer activities, "first step" internships — typically unpaid and more clerical — and school projects.

2. Learn to write a "Power résumé"

A "Power résumé" is one that will tell an employer easily and thoroughly that you are the right candidate for the job.

3. Learn to write a "Power cover letter"

A "Power cover letter" will thoroughly substantiate your claim of being an ideal internship candidate. If you tell an employer you are the best fit for a position, follow up with proof of why you stand out from the rest.

4. Practice, practice, practice, your interviewing skills

Do your research on the company and bring up points of interest in the interview. Have questions for the employer during and after he or she has finished asking questions. Appear enthusiastic about the position. Clearly and specifically state your interest in obtaining the position.

5. Follow up

Send a follow-up thank you letter within 24 hours of the actual interview. This shows you follow through. Within your thank-you letter, indicate that you enjoyed learning whatever it was you learned from the interviewer, reiterate how your skills and experience fit the position and again state your interest in the position.

There never has been a better time to give blood.

The Sept. 11 attack spurred a massive need for blood not only in New York and Washington, D.C., but across the country.

Many blood bank supplies are lower than normal.

This week is the annual blood drive sponsored by K-State and the American Red Cross.

If interested donors were unable to give blood after the attack, they are encouraged to give blood now. There still is a dire need.

Stacey Huertter, student coordinator of the drive, said the goal for this year's drive is to collect 965 units.

Nancy Powell, supervisor of donor resources development, said there is a constant need for blood. This is the chance you might have been waiting for to give blood.

Donation centers will be at the K-State Student Union, the Chester E. Peters Recreation Complex and Putnam Hall basement.

The Red Cross is urging donors to make appointments.

We urge you to take a few moments out of your week to give blood. Let's prove that we not only bleed purple, but that we bleed red as well.

I was wondering if anyone else on campus finds the vegetarian girl in Monkey Boy secretly attractive.

Screw the squirrels. Alvin and the Chipmunks rule.

FYI — straw bales are not the same thing as hay bales.

To the person who was wondering if it makes you a bad person to make out with three boys in one week — no, it just makes you a dirty tramp.

I think Chad May has another year of eligibility left. Let's bring him back.

To the guy who thinks he is a crosswalk expert — the lines run perpendicular to the road.

Crappy music doesn't get any better the louder you play it.

Is it wrong my roommate steals toilet paper from the university?

Does this losing streak mean K-State football games are free next year?

On the comments regarding students and crosswalks — do people in vehicles understand the concept of yielding to pedestrians? I've almost been hit twice, but that is OK because I look forward to my tuition being paid for while one of you imbecile drivers run over my foot again.

I want to know who keeps letting the KU fans call in, trash our football team, criticize Monkey Boy and make generally stupid statements. This is a crime that needs to be stopped.

To the girl who made out with three guys in one week — yes, I am a bad person.

How is it possible an '80s hair band can shut down Washington, D.C.?

It is OK you've made out with three dudes this week because I have made out with five girls this week.

It would be kind of nice to see something constructive and positive in the Fourum for once.

I think today we should tribute all of the security guards at Burger King.

Is there ever a time the columnists don't use the Web sites on the Internet?

Funds needed for more homes; recycling aluminum could help

Editor,

At the present time, Manhattan Habitat for Humanity and K-State Habitat for Humanity have worked together to build 10 houses in just over five years.

However, the Housing Manhattan study shows this does not even come close to meeting the anticipated demands relative to the creation of affordable housing in Manhattan between now and 2005. The study states 235 affordable houses need to be built.

According to information in the Riley County Waste Characterization Study, 448,000 pounds of aluminum was thrown away without being recycled in Manhattan last year. Considering the local recycling center pays 25 cents per pound of aluminum cans, this amount, if recycled, could provide Manhattan Habitat for Humanity with enough funding to build three additional houses annually.

We are trying to raise the necessary funds not only to build house No. 11, but to meet the demands as described in the study mentioned above. To do this, we have implemented a year round effort to recycle aluminum cans.

Manhattan Habitat for Humanity will provide the recycling bins, or you can save your cans and take them to Howie's Recycling, and say "It's for Habitat," and we will receive the funds.

I know that in general, the public is asked to do a lot for organizations such as ours. We are indebted to the K-State students, faculty and staff for their current support of our programs.

A major stereotype

Classifying personalities based on field of study hurtful; diversity at K-State needed for success

When I tell people my major, agricultural communications and journalism, the response I most often receive is: "You don't look like a farmer."

I'm a little confused as to what a "farmer" is supposed to look like.

No, I don't own a cowboy hat, but I do own a few head of cattle and some hogs. Apparently, everyone who raises livestock or farms land has a certain look, which I don't have.

I've met a lot of different, interesting people through my major. None of them have a single thing in common — except for their interest in agriculture and communications.

For some, there is a complete attitude change once I state my curriculum. Their eyes glaze over as they wonder why I'm not driving a tractor. There are a lot of intelligent and dedicated people working in agriculture, both in rural and urban areas. Most of us still have all our teeth and own clothes other than overalls.

During the past few years at K-State, my major has become a test for potential friends. Does the person want to know more about me and my interests after hearing that I'm an "aggie," or do they assume I'm ignorant?

What I'm really testing for is open mindedness.

While I hate the stereotype of the hick farmer, I'll admit that sometimes I fall into the generalization trap as well. I'll catch myself saying things like, "What a typical engineer," or "She's definitely in public relations." I'm sure it annoys those people as much as it does me.

The multiplicity of personalities I've found in the College of Agriculture is similar to every single college on campus, and that diversity never ceases to amaze me.

I've met engineering people who would fit any stereotype, and I've met ag people who could, too. Yet, the majority of the time, there's not a single type of person in either college.

Our curriculum does give a certain insight about the person's career interests and abilities. After all, the colleges at K-State are meant to categorize the world by its components. But professional interests are only part of a person's story.

When I stereotype, it's usually because I haven't taken the time to find out what else the person has to offer the world.

You can categorize people by major, ethnicity, age, wealth, hairstyle and anything else. Yet, it's not the part that counts. What matters is their personality and attitude toward life. You can be a contributing member of society with or without spiked hair — it's the character of the person that's making the difference.

I believe the old adage, "It takes all kinds," is true in education and industry. It takes all sorts people to make a single company work correctly. We have to have engineers, agriculturists, advertisers, writers, scientists and doctors. Even more importantly, we have to realize that these professions encompass different personalities. We have to have thinkers, doers, creators, dreamers, nurturers and analyzers. Many companies today even make their employees take personality tests so they can team up a mix of characters on a project, thereby solving the group project dilemmas every college student has faced at one time or another. While everyone is not an "idea person" 100 percent of the time, it's a lot easier to try to drum up new public relations campaigns with a few creative-minded people on your side.

Let's face it — diversity is encouraged and needed in today's work force. Someday I'll be working with those people whose eyes glaze over when I tell them my major. Hopefully, I'll be their boss by then.

my view

Customer attitude, respect imperative in service

"The customer is always right."

Everyone is familiar with this old adage. It is more than just a statement, but some sort of inner truth that is supposed to be adopted and ingrained by all people working in retail or customer service operations.

It is a creed, an attitude, and in many cases the key to keeping your job.

However, cashiers, salespeople and waitresses will undoubtedly vouch for the fact that a more misleading assumption has never existed. The customer is always right? Whatever.

The fact of the matter is, no one is always right. What's more, some people are almost always wrong, and generally too arrogant to realize it.

These are the people that come into our stores and restaurants on a daily basis, and with an oppressive dark cloud of doom are able to single handedly destroy the pasted on smiles of even the most chipper waitresses and cashiers.

I will never forget one evening, sitting in a local diner. I saw an old lady with paisley socks, blue hair and a face that most definitely terrifies young children. This old lady preceded to bring a young, perky waitress to tears in the middle of the restaurant.

For what? What heinous crime had this waitress committed that merited a high volume verbal tongue lashing complete with embarrassingly loud expletives?

As it turns out, the lady's toast was cold. A cause for annoyance? Probably. The fault of the waitress? Possibly. A good enough excuse to humiliate a hard working young woman in front of numerous other customers? Absolutely not.

As the waitress retreated to the neutral corners of the kitchen, her shift manager placed a firm and less than consoling hand on her trembling shoulder.

"The customer is always right," he reminded her, and coaxed her out onto the bloodstained battlefield of dessert orders and water glasses.

Bullshit, the customer is always right. My friends and I watched the entire scenario with intrigue and pity, fury rose in my throat.

There are sometimes when the customer is not right. While she may have been right about the fact that her toast was cold, and she was understandably irate, the disregard and disrespect that she treated the waitress with eliminated the remainder of her rights from that point.

There is no justification for overt rudeness. There is no bona-fide excuse for the callous treatment of anyone, including those in a position to serve you.

Talk to anyone in a customer service or sales and they will be the first to assure you customers who are friendly, or at least civil, will definitely receive better treatment and merit more help.

A rude customer only hurts themselves. Not only did the lady at the diner make a complete ass out of herself in front of the entire establishment, but the waitress avoided her for the rest of the evening, only offering the required services, not bending over backwards to fetch her a drink refill or empty her ashtray.

I would like to believe when the waitress went back into the kitchen, she spat in the ladies coffee. I am sure it probably didn't happen, but I entertain the notion that someday it probably will.

Rude people eventually get what is coming to them. The whole world will not crumble in tears at every bark or whim of an irrational person. Someday someone will fight back, not only with words but maybe actions.

So, to all the irrationally defunct people in the world, the next time the urge to be heinous and rude strikes you, bear all this in mind:

Customer service and sales representatives may be paid $5.35 an hour to treat you like you are always right, but you aren't. Unless you want someone else's saliva in your warm mochaecino, have some basic respect.

Homecoming week festivities start with Wildcat Request Live

BY GABRIEL BREAZEL
Kansas State Collegian

Wildcat Request Live kicked off Homecoming Week competitions Sunday at City Park.

The second-annual event featured fraternities and sororities lip-synching to dance skits. Acts ranged from the Wizard of Oz to Guns 'N' Roses' "Paradise City."

WRL is a competition in which sororities and fraternities can earn points for All-University Homecoming.

Of the 11 groups that participated in the competition, the top five performances were awarded an additional 25 points, while all groups that participated received 20 points. The skit groups were comprised of one sorority with one fraternity or more. Each group was given four minutes and 30 seconds to perform its acts.

Disc jockeys Kinzie Jo Nelson and Mark McClaskey, from KXKB-FM 104.7, emceed the event dressed in togas. They opened the competition with a "K-S-U, Wildcats" cheer.

The large crowd, which overflowed from the bleachers and general seating onto the grass, called back loudly.

Pi Beta Phi, Sigma Alpha Epsilon and Alpha Gamma Rho won first place for their lip-sync performance to the music of the Wizard of Oz.

Second place went to Delta Delta Delta, Pi Kappa Phi and Pi Kappa Alpha. Third place went to Kappa Kappa Gamma, Tau Kappa Epsilon and Sigma Phi Epsilon.

"[We] just had a lot of fun," Emily Bell, junior in secondary education, said.

Bell was a member of the first place group for its Wizard of Oz lip-synching performance.

"Homecoming Week is all about student creativity," said Missy Decker-Heidrick, associate director of alumni programs. Decker-Heidrick coordinated the event for the KSU Alumni Association.

Homecoming competition is broken down into greek life, residence halls and student organization divisions.

Division winners will be announced at Friday's pep rally following the parade, Decker-Heidrick said.

The 19-person Student Homecoming Committee selected the WRL judges randomly. Judges included K-State students and members of the community.

All those in attendance said the lip-synching contest was a great way to come together.

"It's a good time — all around," said Zach Sneathen, fourth-year student in architecture.

Legislation on terrorism dominates U.S. congress agenda late in 2001 session

BY LIBBY QUAID
Associated Press Writer

WASHINGTON, D.C. — Measures in response to the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks are claiming the lion's share of the action as Congress wraps up work for the year.

Few other measures will pass before the month's end, when lawmakers hope to adjourn. Among these are the 13 annual spending bills for fiscal 2002, which began Oct. 1.

Congress has not yet cleared one of these appropriations measures — and action ground to a halt last week amid the anthrax scare, with the House in recess and the Senate in session but with all Capitol Hill office buildings closed.

Among the most recent attack-related proposals is an effort by Sen.

Pat Roberts, R-Kan., to divert billions of dollars in planned farm subsidy payments to heading off livestock and animal diseases and other farm sabotage.

"The loss of markets resulting from the introduction of these pathogens would be devastating to our nation's economy," Roberts said. "I am suggesting that we make an investment in the future of American agriculture that may well prevent this nightmare scenario."

Roberts is proposing to spend $3.5 billion over the next decade to upgrade government laboratories and pay for research on vaccines, antidotes and pest control. Money set aside by Congress last spring would pay for the measures.

In the meantime, Kansas Sen. Sam Brownback has been pressing to lift sanctions against Pakistan to bolster the U.S.-led coalition against terrorism. Pakistan's beleaguered president, Gen. Pervez Musharraf, is opposed by many Pakistani people for supporting the United States — in a now-familiar scene, mobs this month stormed Quetta, a city near the Afghan border, lobbing firebombs while chanting glory to Osama bin Laden and hatred for America.

The White House and Congress have worked together to lift almost all sanctions against Pakistan. Brownback is sponsoring a measure to erase remaining sanctions.

"We must do everything in our power to strengthen the president's hand in showing the world exactly what it means to be with us or against us," Brownback said.

AMERICA RESPONDS

Brownback, top Republican on the Senate

Judiciary subcommittee on immigration, also is pushing an anti-terrorism bill that, among other things, would require the Immigration and Naturalization Service to track foreign students undergoing such vocational training as flight and language schools.

U.S. immigration and visa systems and how thoroughly they screen people have been under scrutiny since the attacks. Federal officials have said 13 of the 19 terrorist hijackers entered the United States on legal visas, although no records have been found to indicate how the other six got in the country.

Brownback said gaps in security must be closed to restore the nation's confidence, yet he worried along with civil libertarians that the effort to root out terrorists will lead to infringing on individual rights.

"We had a few people who sought to do us harm, and, unfortunately, accomplished that, but let's not compromise our values or our economy in trying to deal with this," said Brownback, who is sponsoring the immigration measure along with the panel's chairman, Sen. Edward M. Kennedy, D-Mass.

Brownback also was co-sponsoring an aid package for laid-off airline workers proposed by Sen. Jean Carnahan, D-Mo. The proposal caused a partisan stalemate on a major aviation security bill, and Carnahan withdrew it after losing a procedural effort to link the two.

She and other supporters are looking for more opportunities to pass the measure.

However, Rep. Todd Tiahrt, R-Kan., worries the legislation would not extend to Kansans who lost their jobs because of the attacks.

About 7,000 aircraft industry workers are expected to be laid off in Wichita by the end of next year; 1,645 received layoff notices from Boeing earlier this month. Boeing Wichita builds most of the best-selling 737; Missouri, Carnahan's state, expects more airline layoffs, mostly at TWA Airlines LLC.

Tiahrt, a member of the Aviation Subcommittee of the House Appropriations Committee, said that while Carnahan's measure specifically mentions airline workers, the language covering such manufacturing employees as Boeing Wichita is too vague and might be interpreted more narrowly.

A&M AGAIN

K-State drops 3rd straight to Texas A&M; Snyder's last-minute play calling falls short

BY DAN SMITH
Kansas State Collegian

Although gains in football usually are measured in yards, K-State would have settled for a few more inches Saturday afternoon at KSU Stadium.

Trailing Texas A&M 31-24 with less than a minute to go and the Cats' needing three yards to extend the drive from the Aggies' five, head coach Bill Snyder made the decision to run a play that had worked like clockwork for much of the game.

"It was an option, and we had run the option well during the course of the day," Snyder said. "I thought we'd have an opportunity to get it one way or the other."

Reserve quarterback Marc Dunn took the snap and moved left behind linemen Matt Martin and Steve Washington just like the Cats (2-4, 0-4) had done so many times earlier in the day.

This time, though, A&M's (6-1, 3-1) defense penetrated enough to force the pitch to tailback Josh Scobey. Scobey turned upfield but was met by A&M safety Terrence Kiel, who wrestled the senior to the ground at the Aggies' three, inches short of the first down marker.

"Rather than try to go downhill at them, we felt we had to get it on the edge and try to run the option," offensive coordinator Ron Hudson said. "It drew up nice — we just didn't quite get it done."

Instead, A&M head coach R.C. Slocumb said the Aggies' wrecking crew defense came up big when it had to.

"We headed down to one play in the ballgame — either they were going to make a play or we were going to make a play, and I felt like we were going to make that play and win that ballgame," he said. "There's not much margin for error there — you gotta stop them, and they did a great job."

But it was K-State's defense that made the majority of big stops Saturday, holding the Aggies to just 189 yards on the day, including just 36 in the second half after allowing 475 yards to Texas Tech the week before.

"I thought our defense did a great job. We had them on the run," defensive coordinator Phil Bennett said. "I just know that when we went out there, our kids played well, and they played with an intensity that we needed after last week."

A&M quarterback Mark Farris, who averaged almost 240 yards per contest coming in, was held to just 138 yards against the Cats.

Although K-State's defense contained the Aggie junior for much of the day, Farris connected with wideout Terrence Murphy five times.

Murphy's fourth reception was the biggest one, resulting in A&M's second touchdown of the first half, a 44-yard bomb from Farris after breaking loose from Faggins' coverage with a nifty move at the line of scrimmage.

"I didn't play my technique, and I didn't play my cover," Faggins said. "I was out to just make a play on the ball."

"They got me with a little stop and go, and I busted on the play. I bit on the stop, and he went to go and he was wide open and it was a touchdown."

Texas A&M went up 14 at that point and would take a seven-point lead into the locker

Dunn steps into leadership role on offense

BY DEREK BOSS
Kansas State Collegian

Offensive coordinator Ron Hudson's late third quarter decision Saturday was too late for the Wildcats.

With K-State down 17-10, quarterback Eli Roberson — still fighting an ankle injury suffered two weeks ago — tried to hit tailback Josh Scobey across the middle near the Cats' own 20-yard line. But the poorly thrown pass was several feet behind his target and was intercepted by Texas A&M linebacker Brian Gamble. The Aggies would find the end zone two plays later to extend their lead to 14.

That got Hudson 'hinking.

"He was struggling some, and he threw the interception, and that was just something that he shouldn't have done," Hudson said of Roberson. "That was a bad pass and a bad decision, and I was just saying to myself, 'We need a change here.'"

But that change wasn't made soon enough. Roberson trotted back on the field for the next possession. And on the very first play of the drive, the hole was dug a bit deeper for K-State.

Taking the snap, Roberson went right on the option, but was met squarely by linebacker Christian Rodriguez. In hopes of avoiding lost yardage on the play, Roberson tried to pitch the ball to Scobey.

Instead avoiding a loss of yardage, he gave up a touchdown as A&M linebacker Jarrod Penright picked up the fumbled pitch at the 17 and took it in for the score.

Now down 31-10 with 31 seconds left in the third, Hudson knew he had to make the change to Marc Dunn. And the Cats responded to the QB change with two scoring drives in their next two possessions — one a 15 play, 65-yarder, and the other spanning 73 yards in 13 plays.

K-State was within a touchdown.

"The players responded to him, and he makes things happen," head coach Bill Snyder said, "even though he's new into the system, so to speak, and he hasn't had a great deal of playing experience. He has enough poise and field presence about himself to manage all the things that are going on and still step up in a leadership role."

But Dunn wasn't finished.

With the Cats down seven and 2:59 left on the clock, the junior had the Cats threatening again.

"Touchdown all the way," Dunn said.

"That's all I was thinking."

But the Cats failed to convert on 4th-and-3 from the Aggies' five-yard line with 0:46 on the clock, and fell to A&M, 31-24.

Nonetheless, the way Dunn engineered the K-State offense in the fourth quarter had Hudson very pleased.

"I was impressed with what Marc did. He completed the ball, ran the option pretty well and got us some right checks," Hudson said. "I'm proud of Marc because after what he did last week, and struggled, he got himself ready to play."

Struggled he did.

Against Texas Tech last weekend, Dunn completed just 16 of 40 passes, threw two interceptions and was sacked five times in the Cats' 38-19 loss.

But against A&M on Saturday, Dunn reversed his fortune. The junior college transfer netted 69 yards passing in the fourth quarter, connecting on 8 of 11 attempts, and also rushed for a touchdown.

"You get your feet wet the first game, and there's a lot of things I looked at on film this week," Dunn said Saturday. "I felt very comfortable back there today."

Yet, neither Dunn's performance nor Roberson's late third quarter errors changed

BAYLOR 17
OKLAHOMA (2) 33
Oklahoma managed to extend the nation's longest winning streak to 20 despite a valiant effort from Baylor in Norman. Sooner quarterback Jason White had a good day in his second game at the helm of Oklahoma's offense, going 32 of 44 for 343 yards, a touchdown and no interceptions.

TEXAS TECH 31
NEBRASKA (3) 41
Red Raider quarterback Cliff Kingsbury torched the Huskers for 353 yards on 33 completions to keep the game close throughout, but in the end it was Texas Tech's offensive line that proved to be the Achilles heel on fourth-and-eight. Kingsbury was sacked with less than a minute left to set up a battle of unbeaten next week between Nebraska and Oklahoma in Lincoln in a possible preview of the Big 12 Championship.

COLORADO (17) 7
TEXAS (8) 41
Buffaloes backup quarterback Bobby Pesavento couldn't fill Craig Och's shoes in the offense as the Colorado understudy completed just 15 of 27 passes for 165 yards and an interception in a laugher. Texas tailback Cedric Benson added 100 yards and two touchdowns on the ground for the Longhorns.

MISSOURI 38
KANSAS 34
Missouri quarterback Kirk Farmer was anything but perfect against the Jayhawks, throwing two interceptions that were returned for touchdowns, but the Tiger signalcaller also managed to toss three touchdowns in the game, including the game-winner to finish off KU in Lawrence. It was Missouri's first win over the Jayhawks on the road in 10 years.

OKLAHOMA STATE 14
IOWA STATE 28
Iowa State senior running back Ennis Haywood rushed for 196 yards and three touchdowns to set a single-game career high for scores in the Cyclones' eighth win in nine games. Iowa State quarterback Seneca Wallace completed 16 of 19 passes for 150 yards, but did most of his damage on the ground, rushing for 67 yards on 10 attempts.

Barrymore goes for a ride

Plot realism makes film enjoyable

Sometimes, the plans you make for your life are drastically different from what actually happens to you.

In "Riding In Cars with Boys,"

Beverly D'Onofrio (Drew Barrymore),

"Ever After")

teaches audiences this age-old lesson

the hard way.

Beverly's world is forever changed when she becomes pregnant at age 15 and gives birth to her son, Jason. Her life thereafter certainly isn't the stuff of dreams. She hastily marries her boyfriend, Ray (Steve Zahn, "Joy Ride"), much to the dismay of her father

(James Woods, "Ghosts of Mississippi").

Beverly's life is a constant struggle to raise her family while pursuing her own dream of getting a high school degree and going to college. Things seem to keep getting in the way, though. She must take care of Ray, now a heroin addict,

as he goes through withdrawal. And her relationship with Jason goes sour after his father leaves, choosing heroin over his wife and son.

Beverly's struggle for a better life, it seems, is met with mounting adversity.

This movie, based on a true story, is a touching tale of forgiveness and the strong bonds of the family. Even in adulthood, Beverly and Jason (played as an adult by Adam Garcia, "Coyote Ugly") have a strained relationship.

Each one blames the other for ruining his or her life. In an interesting juxtaposition, Beverly's father blames his daughter for ruining his dreams of a better life for her and himself.

One of the best parts about the movie is how real the relationships between the characters seem. Mother and son don't just exchange a few harsh words and then completely forgive each other. It is obvious that at the end of the movie, there still is a lot of work to do on forgiveness, and they merely have taken the first steps toward healing.

The problems aren't completely solved in a time span of two hours, and that's as it should be. Besides being another winner for Barrymore and director Penny Marshall, "Riding in Cars with Boys" examines the life of one person making the transition from teen-ager into adulthood (a la "The Wonder Years"), emerging as a stronger, wiser woman.

Ozzy back with same unique sound

Hold out your hand. Depress your middle and ring fingers. Now hold your thumb over those two fingers.

Congratulations, you've just made the metal horns required for listening to Ozzy.

With his first studio album since 1995's "Ozzmosis" Ozzy Osbourne is back with an album that proves the 52-year-old can still bang his head.

"Down To Earth" is yet another pairing of Ozzy with respected metal guitarist

Zakk Wylde.

The album actually is refreshing in a music world where many bands seem to be following a trend of one kind or another. That's because the only person who sounds like this is Ozzy. Everyone else is afraid of the stigma hair metal still carries with it. And let's face it, he had a lot to do with the birth of '80s hair metal and hard rock.

Ozzy takes on the sound without shame and some of the stuff on the album would be cheesy if it were done by anyone else. Not only does he pull off head-banging riff-heavy songs like "That I Never Had," but the power ballad is in full force. While "Dreamer" and "Running

Out of Time" won't replace "Mama, I'm Comin' Home," they at least remind metal fans of what metal was before it had the nu in front of it.

The sound is very reminiscent of "Ozzmosis" but doesn't instantly hook listeners like the 1995 release. It only took one listen to get hooked on tracks such as "Ghost Behind My Eyes" and

"Perry Mason," but it takes at least a couple times through to really get into the new album.

"Gets Me Through" is the first single from the album and the lead track.

It's a conveniently appropriate track in which Ozzy acknowledges the fact that he has become a larger-than-life heavy metal deity. "I'm not the kind of person you think I am / I'm not the antichrist or the Iron Man," are the first words of the album, accompanied by Wylde's crunching guitar riffs.

Some of the other songs on the album just sound like re-hashed Ozzy work. Don't expect any great artistic leaps here because there aren't any. It's just the same old style fans will eat up. If you didn't like Ozzy before, you won't like him now, because nothing has changed.

The second track, "Facing Hell," was better when it was called "I Don't Know" and Randy Rhoads played the solo. In fact, many of the tracks can be traced back to earlier similar songs.

Still, it's difficult to expect anything less from an artist who has released such a great deal of work. The album is worth picking up for Ozzy fans just because Ozzy still rocks.

Suspense, gore enhance murder mystery film

He struck a chord of fear in the heart of late 19th century England and has been immortalized in history as one of the most enigmatic killers who ever lived.

The latest movie on

Jack the Ripper and his mysterious crime spree in the fall of 1888 bares all for the audience to see. "From Hell" is a gruesome, thrilling depiction of murder at its most vile.

Johnny Depp ("Sleepy Hollow"), who is completely in his element in this type of movie, plays Inspector

Frederick George Abberline. He is assigned to the Ripper case after the first murder occurs Aug. 31, 1888, and his investigation takes him from the filthy streets of London's Whitechapel District to the highest names in English government. His list of suspects even includes a doctor (Sir Ian Holm, "The Fifth Element") who attends the royal family.

As the murders of prostitutes continue, Abberline relies on his keen sense of vision (usually taking effect only in moments of drug-induced hallucination) to track down Jack the Ripper as one mutilated, disemboweled body after another turns up.

While not completely historically accurate, "From Hell" paints a picture of gore

and suspense

that will leave viewers spellbound. The movie, also based on the comic book series, uses stunning cinematography in its flashbacks to give the viewer an idea of the horrific scope of the killings. A flash of a knife, a pool of blood, and even a small fly landing on the face of a corpse all make the audience feel close to the action.

The absence of daylight also adds an eerie effect.

Though the movie is inaccurate in a few places, it still works well.

The fictitious romance between

Abberline and prostitute Mary Kelly

(Heather Graham, "Austin Powers:

The Spy Who Shagged Me"), while unrealistic, isn't given so much screen time that it distracts the viewer from the real plot.

"From Hell" tells the story of the Jack the Ripper killings with an artful yet gruesome flair and will no doubt scare the hell out of you.

Scapegoats available after loss to A&M

BY DAN SMITH
Kansas State Collegian

In football, it all comes down to drive. And Saturday afternoon at Wagner Field, it just didn't look like the Cats had it.

At least not when it counted the most.

With their backs against the wall and everything on the line in a must-win game, K-State flat choked against Texas A&M. And the result wasn't pretty.

Whether you were one of 49,935 fans at KSU Stadium on Saturday who saw the disappointment in person, or just another armchair quarterback at home who got to see the shame on television, surely you have come up with a list of people who are to blame for K-State's latest setback.

I was in the press box Saturday and got to see and hear about as much as a K-State fan could bear. With three minutes left, I went down to the field and saw Terrence Kiel hit Josh Scobey and stop both him and K-State's chances for an amazing comeback.

So, I share with you a list of acceptable culprits whose shoulders are more than wide enough to carry the criticism of another Wildcat loss.

Blame starting quarterback Eli Roberson's inability to move the ball under pressure for three quarters.

Blame offensive coordinator Ron Hudson for failing to hold his unit accountable for turnovers and mental mistakes after six games and four losses.

Blame the secondary, DeMarcus Faggins in particular, for allowing Aggie receivers Terrence Murphy and Jamaar Taylor to break loose for big gains in the second quarter.

Blame the Cats' defense for letting A&M running back Derek Farmer set the tone early on the ground.

Blame Aaron Lockett for fumbling away a chance to take the lead by mishandling Cody Scates' punt in the third quarter.

Blame the officials for not spotting senior tailback Josh Scobey's final dive another foot closer to the end zone.

Blame head coach Bill Snyder for calling for the option on the last play, with Marc Dunn, a natural passer, instead of any other play in his playbook.

Blame the Wildcat seniors for not showing the type of leadership that has been such an important cog in Snyder's win-machine for the past 13 years.

Blame your roommate for not being on the team as a walk-on kicker, or your buddy for running out of beer at your pregame tailgate.

Bottom line — blame someone for Saturday's loss to Texas A&M. And while you're at it, go ahead and blame that person for whatever else is to come for K-State's football team this year.

At 0-4 in the Big 12 with five games remaining, the Cats are going to need to come up with quite a few excuses to explain why a team that has set a precedent for making so much out of so little has fallen flat on its face lately.

Getting to be bowl eligible is the next baby step the Cats will be looking to tackle. But given that such a feat will require K-State to win four of its final five games, even a bowl game is unlikely this season.

It's tough to say and even harder to think, but we may have witnessed the rise and fall of K-State football all in the last four years.

room after a Josh Scobey touchdown late in the second quarter got the Cats on the board.

Just as K-State seemed to have regained momentum in the second half, whittling the A&M lead to as little as four with 4:58 to go in the third quarter, the wheels fell off.

Normally, reliable punt returner

Aaron Lockett muffed a Cody Scates offering with 3:10 to play in the third, the first pebble in a landslide that would bury the Cats late in the game.

The Aggies scored 17 unanswered points to go up 31-10 off two Eli Roberson turnovers and Lockett's mishandled return, and survived a late offensive charge by the Cats to put the wraps on K-State's fourth consecutive loss in the Big 12.

"It's frustrating," Lockett said. "It's hard to pinpoint what's going on, but it's almost like a little rolling stone — one bad thing happens and everything starts to go bad."

Those bad experiences, coupled with K-State's winless drought, have led Snyder to an uncharacteristically pessimistic outlook for the rest of the season.

"You probably run out of time sometimes," he said. "I don't mean in a ballgame, I just mean in terms of sometimes it's not your day — sometimes it might not be your season."

DUNN

Hudson's perception.

"Other than the interception and the free touchdown, you might say, Eli did fine. He ran the option well," Hudson said. "I'm not disturbed by Eli in what he did. It's just that there were a couple mistakes he made. But I'm assuming that Eli is hurt. I visited with him after the game — and he's hurting."

If Roberson were healthy, Hudson said the quarterback situation wouldn't have changed much at all this season, even with Dunn's success against A&M.

"I think Marc has some ingredients that you can't coach. He's a kid that likes to compete, and he did well today," Hudson said Saturday. "I can't take that away from him, but to say that there's a quarterback controversy, that wouldn't be fair to Eli or to Marc. We just have to reassess where we are right now and what our health is."

"We've obviously got to try to get Eli back, but continue to grow with Marc."

Postal worker ill from anthrax in D.C.; 2 postal facilities close

BY LAURA MECKLER
Associated Press Writer

WASHINGTON — A District of Columbia postal worker is "gravely ill" from inhalation anthrax, a rare and lethal form of the disease, prompting the Postal Service to close two facilities and begin testing more than 2,200 workers for exposure.

The man, who was not identified, is the third person in the nation to come down with the most serious form of the disease, where anthrax spores enter the respiratory system and lodge deep in the lungs. Six others, including two postal workers, have been infected with a highly treatable form that is contracted through the skin.

Mayor Anthony Williams said the latest victim, the first in Washington to contract the disease, was gravely ill. He was listed in serious but stable condition at a suburban Virginia hospital near his home.

As postal workers lined up for testing, the number of people directly affected — although not sickened — by the anthrax-by-letter scare reached well above 5,000 just in the nation's capital. Investigators focused on Trenton, N.J., where some of the tainted letters were mailed.

Congressional leaders said they would reopen the Capitol today, though House and Senate office buildings will remain closed until results from environmental testing are complete.

An anthrax-laced letter that arrived a week ago at Senate Majority Leader Tom Daschle's office was processed at the central mail processing facility where the man worked. But officials said they did not know whether the worker came into contact with it or whether there might have been other tainted letters that have yet to be discovered.

The man first developed flu-like symptoms in the middle of last week but did not feel ill enough to go to the hospital until Friday. Sick with fever and chest pain, he immediately was given Cipro and other antibiotics, but health officials did not know whether they began treatment early enough to save his life.

Surgeon General David Satcher said inhalation anthrax — which is not contagious — has been fatal about 80 percent of the time.

"But that's in the past. We have different technology today," he said on CNN's "Late Edition."

Health investigators moved quickly to determine whether anthrax was present in either of two postal facilities where the man worked and whether other employees might have been exposed.

More than 2,100 workers at Washington's main mail processing center and 150 at an air mail handling center near Baltimore-Washington International Airport were asked to report for nasal swab testing, which will help determine where in the buildings exposure might have occurred. Employees each will be given a 10-day supply of antibiotics to ward off infection in case they were exposed.

The testing began at City Hall on Sunday, an hour after officials confirmed the diagnosis. It was to continue today at D.C. General Hospital.

Officials also planned extensive environmental testing at both facilities. They will use the results, along with the nasal swab testing, to determine which workers will need a full course of preventive antibiotics.

The victim worked in a small room and did not typically come into contact with the large sorting machines, said Deborah Willhite, a top Postal Service official. She said it was unclear how he might have inhaled enough anthrax — at least 8,000 of the invisible spores — to contract the inhalation form.

After the Daschle letter was discovered, the Postal Service hired independent contractors to test the district facility for anthrax, but those results will not be available until late Sunday or Monday, Willhite said.

Both facilities will be closed until testing and cleaning can be completed, she said.

On Capitol Hill, an environmental sweep through 19 buildings continued Sunday. Investigators have found traces of anthrax in four of them, and 28 people have tested positive for exposure, though none have been diagnosed with the disease.

MILITARY

Taliban forces and accomplished their objectives, the Pentagon said. They also left behind a message — copies of a photo of firemen raising the American flag on the rubble of the World Trade Center superimposed with the words "Freedom Endures," a Pentagon official said.

"They had two objectives. One was the Taliban leadership compound, especially Omar's compound. The other was an air field," Myers said Sunday. "On both of them we thought there was a pretty good chance we could find some useful intelligence."

Documents and other items taken during the assaults were being analyzed Sunday for their intelligence value, defense officials said.

As has been the Pentagon's practice, Myers would not describe the continuing missions, citing safety concerns for troops.

"I doubt if a coach is going to give away his game plan for today before he executes that plan," he said.

But two defense officials, speaking on condition of anonymity, said Sunday that forces were pressing on with a wide range of operations, including some meant to be kept secret even after they are over.

Myers denied the Taliban's claim that it shot down a U.S. helicopter, killing 20 to 25 American soldiers. He also said he had no information on reports that at least one U.S. soldier was injured by a land mine and several soldiers might be missing.

The Pentagon has said two Rangers were killed in Pakistan when a Black Hawk helicopter crashed during poor visibility.

Officials said Sunday that hostile fire had been ruled out as a cause of the accident, which they still were investigating. They identified the Rangers as Spc. Jonn J. Edmunds, 20, of Cheyenne, Wyo., and Pfc. Kristofer T. Stonesifer, 28, of Missoula, Mont. They served with the 75th Ranger Regiment based at Fort Benning, Ga., the Army said.

Officials would not disclose the role of the Black Hawk, although some believed it was preparing to swoop across the border into Afghanistan in the event any Rangers had to be rescued.

U.S. warplanes bombarded Taliban positions Sunday near a front line north of the capital of Kabul, marking what could be the start of a more aggressive campaign on behalf of opposition forces fighting the Islamic regime.

The attacks Sunday were the closest and most intense strikes so far against Taliban positions defending Kabul from north alliance forces. Alliance officials had been asking the United States to bomb the front line north of Kabul so they could advance on the capital, but until now U.S. bombing of front line positions has mostly taken place around the strategic northern city of Mazar-e-Sharif.

Powell said the United States was very interested in seeing rebel forces take Mazar-e-Sharif, but still was continuing discussion about whether a rebel march into Kabul would be "the best thing."

The United States and Britain had been reluctant to help the alliance seize Kabul until a broad-based government had been formed to take over from the Taliban.

Meantime, Powell said there is no timetable for completion of military operations. However, he said the onset of winter and the start of the Muslim holy month of Ramadan — both arriving in mid-November — could have an impact on how they are conducted.

Also on Sunday, the British Broadcasting Corp. quoted an Afghan doctor as saying the 10-year-old son of Taliban leader Omar was killed during U.S.-led strikes. The boy died two weeks ago, on the first night of bombing raids on the Taliban stronghold of Kandahar, Dr. Abdul Barri said.

It also is important that donors drink plenty of water and eat

Powell said the K-State blood drive is the largest in the Central Plains Region of the American Red Cross. The region provides blood to more than 100 hospitals throughout Kansas and northern Oklahoma.

Powell said the blood is sent to wherever it is most needed. Interest in donating blood has skyrocketed since the tragedy in New York and Washington, D.C., but Powell said she hopes people remember blood is needed all the time.

"We have an ongoing need for blood," Powell said. "Although the tragedy brought the need to everyone's attention, we have to remember that every day, someone, somewhere needs blood."

Attacks on Taliban shifting to troop divisions

BY ROBERT BURNS
The Associated Press

WASHINGTON, D.C. — Shifting the focus of U.S. airstrikes in Afghanistan from fixed military targets to Taliban troops is a logical progression toward the goal of destroying the Taliban and the al-Qaeda terrorist network they harbor, Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld said Monday.

"The reason for the air attacks on Taliban and al-Qaeda forces is to destroy Taliban and al-Qaeda forces," Rumsfeld said, denying suggestions that the Bush administration had held back on bombing those front-line Taliban positions out of concern that the opposition northern alliance would capture Kabul.

"We're not holding back at all," he said.

Rumsfeld also did not hold back his anger at leaks of information to the American news media last Friday indicating that U.S. special operations forces were planning to enter Afghanistan.

Rumsfeld said it was vital that some information about U.S. military operations in Afghanistan remain secret.

"We cannot and will not provide information that could jeopardize the success of our efforts to root out and liquidate the terrorist networks that threaten our people," he said.

Rumsfeld also denied Taliban claims that two U.S. helicopters were shot down during Friday's raid. Video footage from the Al-Jazeera television network showed people gathered around several large wheels the Taliban said were a downed helicopter's landing gear.

On another Taliban claim, that U.S. and British planes bombed a hospital in western Afghanistan and killed 100 people, Rumsfeld said "We have absolutely no evidence at all" that the report is correct.

The chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, Air Force Gen. Richard Myers, agreed that there is no evidence, but said: "We're not quite as certain about that yet, so we're going to continue to look. The last thing we want is to cause any civilian casualties."

British officials said none of their planes participated in any raid against Herat, where the bombing was alleged to have occurred.

The top commander of U.S. forces involved in the military campaign, Army Gen. Tommy Franks, flew to the region on Sunday to consult with government officials and visit some of the troops.

Pentagon spokesman Marine Corps Lt. Col. David Lapan said Franks' itinerary was secret, at least for now. It is known, however, to include a stop in Saudi Arabia, a key U.S. ally in the region. Franks is commander in chief of U.S. Central Command, and his headquarters is in Tampa, Fla.

Up to now, the focus of U.S. bombing had been Taliban air defenses, airfields, aircraft, military support structures like barracks, command-and-control facilities, communications, ammunition warehouses, vehicle and weapon repair facilities and training camps used by the al-Qaida terrorists.

Checkups aid battle against cancerBY SARAH BAHARI
Kansas State Collegian

Early detection and education are the keys to preventing breast cancer.

Still, many young women do not practice self-breast exams, health officials said.

"It's important for women to be familiar with their breasts," said Carol Kennedy, director of health promotion and education for Lafene Health Center. "All young women should do it."

According to www.cancer.org, breast cancer is the second most common cancer among women, next only to skin cancer. (i) About 192,000 women will be diagnosed with the disease this year. About 40,600 will die from it.

For October — Breast Cancer Awareness Month — a bulletin board in Lafene describes prevention, symptoms and statistics. The purpose of the board is to educate college-aged people about the risks, Kennedy said.

Also, on Wednesday, Lafene will sponsor a health fair from 10 a.m. to 2 p.m. in the K-State Student Union. More information about breast cancer will be available.

April Hamilton, community relations and planning coordinator for Mercy Health Center, said although it is uncommon for young women to get breast cancer, it is possible.

"Breast cancer doesn't discriminate," Hamilton said. "Being proactive is the best way to prevent it." Women over the age of 20 should begin self-breast exams once a month. Women ages 20 to 39 should have a clinical breast exam performed by a professional every three years. And women over the age of 40 should have mammograms every year.

For women who qualify based on need, the Riley County Health Department offers free mammograms.

Mercy on College Avenue also offers a cancer support group at 7 p.m. the second and fourth Monday of each month.

For more information, contact Mercy at 776-3322 or Lafene's Women's Center at 532-6554.

Quick facts

Breast cancer is a malignant tumor that has developed from cells of the breast. The disease occurs mostly in women, but does occur rarely in men. The chance of getting breast cancer increases as women get older. Women also are at a higher risk if family members have had the disease.

Nicole Spaulding, 6, paints the window of Wholesale Beauty Club on Poyntz Avenue with palm trees and K-State support phrases for the upcoming game against the University of Kansas. The Boys and Girls Club of Manhattan spent the afternoon painting the windows of businesses along Poyntz.

Center fosters childrens' safety

BY OLENA NIKOLAYENKO

Raising children single-handedly and working full-time, Farida Spaulding feels confident that her children are off the streets during the after-school hours.

"My twins, Nicole and Michael, and also my older kids go to the Teen Center because the staff makes sure the kids are OK," Spaulding said.

Every school day, white vans pick up children at Manhattan elementary schools and bring them to the Boys and Girls Club of Manhattan, at 305 S. Fourth Street.

"Our mission is to inspire and enable all young people, especially those from disadvantaged circumstances, to realize their full potential as productive, caring, and responsible," Barb Allen, the club's executive director, said.

helping in the COMMUNITY

This is a weekly series profiling a United Way agency.

The Teen Center, a branch of the Boys and Girls Club, has been in the community since 1973. Over the years, it grew in size and chartered with the Boys and Girls Club of America.

"We moved into this building in April 2000, and we are still looking for additional space," Allen said. "We reached maximum building capacity within two months."

Additionally, after-school club sites are located at Northview Elementary School, Anthony Middle School and Eisenhower Middle School.

Over the past year, 1,024 children aged 6 to 18 have benefited from the after-school program.

"We hear from a lot of parents that without such a program the children would have stayed at home alone," Allen said. "That is pretty scary for somebody who is 6 years old."

Allen said 45 percent of the children come from economically disadvantaged families. She said the club offers them a safe environment and an affordable price — $5 per year in membership dues. That is why the organization has to grapple with economic difficulties.

"Funding is a big challenge for us," Allen said. Allen said the organization is often looking for volunteers. In 2000, 427 volunteers provided 9,640 total volunteer hours for the club.

"It is a great opportunity for K-State students to get involved in the community," Allen said.

Housemother volunteers time, energy to K-State's annual blood drive

BY KECIA N. SEYB
Kansas State Collegian

She no longer gives blood because of her diabetes, but Frances Russell, FarmHouse housemother, still donates her time at K-State blood drives.

This is her fourth year helping out. She said she volunteers for one reason.

"Seeing the students," she said. "College life is great. It's better the second time around. I don't have any homework, any tests. I can stay up as late as I want."

Russell is one of several Greek housemothers who help out with the blood drives, working different shifts. She serves students juice, water, coffee, doughnuts, cookies or hot tea after they finish donating blood.

"Our whole theme is 'smile, smile, smile' — make everybody happy," she said.

Giving blood was the thing to do Monday whether students wanted to help out or just needed something to do.

"I didn't really have anything else to do today," Craig Jackson, sophomore in kinesiology, said. "I thought it was a good thing to do with all the stuff that's going on right now."

Jackson was one of many students who gave blood not only in the K-State Student Union's K, S and U ballrooms, but also at Chester E. Peters Recreational Complex and the basement of Putnam Hall.

In the lobby of the second floor of the Union, students filled out their blood donation records. Then they went into the K Room where specialists briefly asked about their medical histories, took their vital signs, pulse and temperature and checked iron levels.

Next, student volunteers such as Nikki Banwart, junior in biology, escorted the blood donors into the S Room, where 12 people at once could give blood.

Banwart, who was volunteering on behalf of the Pre-Med Honor Society, said this year's blood drive was different from others because donors had to make appointments.

Although she donated her time, Banwart said she wasn't certain whether she would

Anthrax illness likely cause of postal workers' death

WASHINGTON, D.C. — Two postal workers at a site that handles mail for the Capitol died Monday, apparently from anthrax, officials said, and two more remained hospitalized with the life-threatening disease as the nation's bioterror casualty count mounted.

Health officials expressed concern about as many as nine other area people who have exhibited symptoms consistent with the disease.

The officials issued an urgent appeal for hundreds more postal workers at the facility to undergo testing.

"Anyone who was working in that back postal area during the last 11 days, you must today immediately come here ... to receive prophylactic medication and to be evaluated," said Dr. Ivan Walks, a Washington, D.C., health official. About 2,000 employees work at the Brentwood facility, and many already had submitted to tests or lined up to comply.

Shortly after he spoke, Surgeon General David Satcher said it was highly probable that the two postal workers who died over the weekend had succumbed to anthrax.

STATE IN BRIEF

Husband of Army soldier charged in stepson's death

The husband of a Fort Riley soldier is facing allegations for the murder of his stepson.

Dwayne Allen Gilmore, 25, was charged Friday with one count of murder for the death of Quendarius Demarcus Eirby, 2, the son of his wife.

Eirby allegedly was beaten to death in his mother's home in the Colyer Manor Housing Area, according to a press release from Fort Riley.

He was pronounced dead at Irwin Army Community Hospital at 9:30 a.m. Thursday.

An affidavit alleging Gilmore's role in Eirby's death was filed Thursday, United States Attorney Jim Flory said.

Gilmore is detained and attended a detention hearing at 2:30 p.m. Monday.

"He is detained and is in federal custody," Flory said.

Gilmore's next court date is set for Nov. 6.

The maximum sentence for such a crime is life in federal prison without the possibility of parole. The FBI is leading the investigation.

Other investigating agencies include the U.S. Army Criminal Investigation Division, the U.S. Department of Justice and Fort Riley's Criminal Investigation Division.

The name of the soldier will not be released because she is not a suspect in the case, said Christie Vanover, the deputy media relations officer for the compound.

The body is undergoing autopsy at the State of Kansas Medical Examiner's Office in Topeka.

Ambassador candidates announced at kickoff event

BY LYNNE HERMANSEN
Kansas State Collegian

Residence halls kicked off Homecoming Week with plenty of purple spirit, friends and chocolate.

The Kansas State University Association of Residence Halls sponsored the Crazy Cat Kickoff Monday to get the residence halls involved in homecoming.

"It is a time to have fun, relax and be silly," said Kristine Kelley, sophomore in elementary education and the Social Program Coordinator for KSUARH.

Events began with the announcement of this year's student ambassador candidates: Emily Bell, junior in secondary education; Crystal Kramer, senior in interior architecture; Matt Dill, senior in finance; and Matt Painter, junior in criminology.

Students can vote for one male and one female student ambassador this week in the K-State Student Union or in the dining halls.

Those students in attendance represented their residence halls by participating in a three-legged relay race, bobbing for onions, stuffing marshmallows in their mouths in a game of Chubby Bunny and playing tug of war.

The tug of war brought seven people from each team together in a mess of Hershey's chocolate syrup and oatmeal.

"A good mess always equals a good time," Josh Kennett, freshman in secondary education said.

Speaker promotes personal narratives

BY TRACEE DUGAN
Kansas State Collegian

Listening to the personal stories of those people involved is imperative to understanding historical events, Olga Idriss Davis said in a speech as part of the Lou Douglas Lecture Series on Monday night.

Specifically, she illustrated the Tulsa Race Riot and the importance of the narrative discourse of cultural memory.

"The Tulsa Race Riot of 1921 illuminates the role of the community as a performance of survival," Davis said.

Davis, who spoke in Forum Hall in the K-State Student Union, said the Tulsa Race Riot occurred in June 1921 after a young black man allegedly attacked a young white woman in a Tulsa, Okla. elevator.

At that time in history, Tulsa was divided into a predominantly white section and a predominantly black section, which was referred to as the Greenwood business district. The area covered 36 square blocks and was home to about 15,000 black residents.

Davis said that following the elevator incident, a report in the Tulsa Tribune spurred a confrontation between black and white mobs around the courthouse, where the suspected young black man was being kept. A mass riot began, in which white members of the community pillaged and set fire to black homes and businesses in the Greenwood area.

Davis, whose grandfather was a later victim of the riots, spoke about the importance of the cultural narrative and hearing other's stories.

"Personal narrative is something that is very rich and valuable," she said. "I see that narrative is a way of helping people cope."

With the aid of a Power Point presentation, Davis outlined the benefits of narrative discourse as economic struggle, family and community coalitions, never forget and post-tragedy redress.

Clips from the PBS documentary "The American Experience: Goin' Back to 'T' town" were used to emphasize the hardship through which black community members suffered during the riots. It also gave examples of narratives from actual survivors of the incident. Davis concluded the presentation with an excerpt from a Maya Angelou poem.

"I really enjoyed it. It was quite an interesting lecture," said Jonathan Olivigni, freshman in chemical engineering. "I think she did a very good job."

Davis is a graduate of Julliard and received her doctoral degree in rhetoric from the University of Nebraska-Lincoln. She served as an assistant professor of speech and theater at K-State from 1994 to 1998 and now is an assistant professor of performance studies and women's studies at Arizona State University.

The desire to work with kids, compassion and caring are musts for such a job.

Melissa Valadez, senior in political science and unit director, said the staff serves as positive role models for children.

Based on physical, emotional, cultural and social needs and interests of the children, the club offers program activities in five areas: character and leadership development; education and career development; health and life skills; the arts and sports and fitness and recreation.

In addition, the tutoring program, Power Hour, assists children in improving their performance at school.

However, it is not only children who are educated. The Family Night on Wednesdays involves parent education. Children play team-building exercises while their parents attend free classes designed to increase drug and alcohol awareness and enhance their parental skills.

Jennifer Wilson, youth development agent with K-State Research & Extension for Riley County, is teaching an eight-session workshop on anger management.

"The goal of the workshop is to help parents understand what triggers their anger and how to manage it in a constructive way," Wilson said.

Against all odds, Valadez said, the staff takes pride in making a difference in children's lives.

"We show them the positive side of life versus the harsh reality many of them have to deal with at home," she said.

Breast cancer awareness important for people of both sexes

More than 40,000 men and women in the United States will die from breast cancer this year, according to the American Cancer Society Web page. Breast Cancer also is the second-most common cancerous killer of women.

While breast cancer is about 100 times more common among women, an estimated 400 men will die this year from breast cancer.

This month is Breast Cancer Awareness

Month. It is important for men and women to become educated on how to detect this disease.

Women between the ages of 20 and 40 should have a clinical breast examination every three years, according to the American Cancer Society Web page.

Women and men also should perform monthly self-examinations so they can detect any changes in the breast tissue.

When breast cancer is detected early, the suffering and pain that goes with it can be significantly reduced. If you never have had a clinical breast examination, please go to a doctor and have one completed soon. Don't forget to give yourself a monthly self-examination. Post reminders in the shower or get a shower-proof guide from Lafene.

Lastly, support breast cancer research. If nothing else get a pink pin. Cancer is attacking a large number of mothers, sisters, aunts, girlfriends and even husbands, brothers and grandfathers.

The Collegian's Campus Fourum is an anonymous call-in system that allows readers to voice their opinions on topics relevant to the publication.

Coach Snyder needs to give our offensive coordinator a one-way ticket to Timbuktu.

Can anyone tell me why they are calling Martin Gramatica, "Bill Gramatica"?

All I have to say about this football season is it makes me look forward to basketball season.

I will start cheering again for the football team when they start showing up for games.

Like I said before, any team with 'Kansas' in the name is a major choke team.

Did anyone else see the kid at the game with the mullet? I did.

Oh great, another greek week is here.

Are we going to tear down the goalposts if we beat KU next week?

Even if we had scored a touchdown at the end of the Texas A&M game, we still would've lost because we would have missed the extra point.

I just wanted to know when Snyder is going to write a book on this turnaround.

Our band is so cool.

Saturday's game was not a total loss. At least I got to touch Willie's butt while he was crowd surfing.

I think we should rename one of the campus buildings to Joe Hall.

Just a word of advice, never hit on a girl with a 'yield to the princess' license plate.

I wonder if I am the only person who just reads the Fourum, then throws the rest of the Collegian away.

READERS WRITE

Women protecting themselves turned into unfair mockery

Editor,
I am writing in regard to the "panty raid" that occurred Oct. 7 at the Pi Beta Phi house. I am not writing to set the record straight about the events of that morning. I'm not writing to inform the public that initially we were unaware that underwear had even been taken.

We learned of the theft after 12 terrified women crowded in my locked room because at 5 a.m., three members discovered two male strangers dressed in dark clothing hiding in a closet on the third floor.

As I dialed 911, memories of Ted Bundy and the Chi Omega murders flashed through my head. A sorority house is not exempt from random violence, and to assume so would diminish the safety of the women who live there.

I am not writing because our peers, newspapers and a morning radio show made us look silly and mocked us for calling the police. The safety of women is no laughing matter.

The threat and fear of rape and violence is vivid in the minds of women today, and we acted to protect the 81 women who live in our home when we felt threatened. Instead of acknowledging that these men made a mistake, there has been a lot of not-so-subtle blame thrown our way for the repercussions of these men's actions.

They made poor choices that violated our right to feel safe in our home, but we've taken the heat for acting appropriately. I write because I can only hope this victim-blaming will not cause other women to hesitate about seeking help in a similar situation.

Luckily, the intruders in our house did not have malicious intent, but I would hate for any woman to risk her safety on the assumption that someone meant her no harm.

This isn't about a greek prank. This is about the way our community responded to women who were afraid, and whose privacy had been violated.

I urge people to think twice before blaming women for trying to protect themselves, because the next time could be not an intended prank, but a tragic moment, that shatters lives.

Senior in mathematics

VIDEO GAME VIOLENCE

Actions in gaming should not reflect those in actual life

I crept stealthily down the dark corridor, trying to make as little noise as possible. I was on a dangerous mission, and any wrong move might be my last.

My body tensed as I heard a sound behind me. I whirled around, but no one was there. It was probably just a rat or something. Turning back, I continued on my way. Out of habit, I made sure my rifle was loaded and ready for action. I didn't plan on being seen, but there was just no way of knowing what might happen. Sometimes, you just can't tell.

The click didn't come a moment too soon. When I heard it, I knew instantly what I had to do. I dove and rolled behind a crate. A split second later, a bullet smashed into the wall behind where I was standing.

I came up shooting and was rewarded with the sight of my enemy falling to the ground and a message at the bottom of the screen: "$$Gold_Digger$$ has been killed by LockeSmythe." I breathed a sigh of relief. I was safe — at least for now.

Every day, scenarios like this unfold on computer screens across campus as people from all sorts of backgrounds play first-person shooter video games. The FPS genre is enormously popular, and more people are getting into the scene all the time.

FPS games like "Quake," "Unreal" and "Counter-Strike" (a modification of "Half Life") are among the most played games on the Internet. They regularly show up on lists of most popular downloads at Download.com and Yahoo! Games. In addition, there are thousands of Internet servers dedicated to multi-player FPS gaming. Despite (or perhaps because of) their wide fan bases, FPS games are controversial.

Some experts suggest this type of video game makes people more likely to display aggression. Army psychologist and violence specialist Lt. Col. Dave Grossman claims that FPS games turn kids into ultraviolent killing machines. He argues the games counteract humans' innate resistance to killing other humans.

On the other end of the spectrum, professional gaming attorney Larry Walters claims censorship of FPS games violates the First Amendment. He says video games don't make people more likely to perform violent acts. Rather, the decision of whether to harm others is a personal choice everyone makes. We are not merely a function of our environmental influences.

Who's right? This question hinges on another, more complicated one: what makes humans harm other humans? If our nature is to refrain from hurting others, violent input certainly could have the effect of removing that restraint.

But, how would violent input affect human attitudes toward violence if we were predisposed toward doing violent things? If humans naturally tend to hurt one another, it would seem that the only thing restraining most of us from doing so is the influence of society.

I would argue that FPS games reduce society's influence on gamers. Many FPS games have the potential to be unbelievably addictive. I know dozens of people who regularly skip classes, meals, and advising meetings in order to finish "just one more" game of "Counter-Strike" or "Quake Team Fortress."

When people spend so much time in front of machines, they become less closely connected to other humans. This means their contact with society grows weaker over time.

While I certainly do not think video games force anyone to commit violent acts, FPS games at least don't prevent violence. In fact, they have the potential to alienate people from one another, which (according to some theories) makes violence more likely.

Regardless of who's right about why people hurt others, violent video games — and particularly first-person shooters — aren't doing anything to prevent violence. The bottom line is, no one's really sure about the link between FPS games and violence.

Studies so far have been fairly inconclusive, and I'm convinced there are too many factors involved to provide a solid answer anytime soon.

Since we don't know for certain how violent video games affect people's actions, I would suggest for us to be careful with how we spend time.

There's nothing wrong with having fun with friends, playing video games over a LAN, but don't get carried away. Don't allow entertainment to dictate your actions.

Football schedule ignored in planning of break

I hope everyone feels rested and refreshed after this weekend.

After all, it was fall break. This was the second year the university has generously given students a Friday free of classes and tests.

Too bad it has yet to give students a real break.

Last year the first fall break was christened Oct. 20, the Friday of Homecoming Week. This left students involved with Homecoming unable to go home or relax, two of the reasons for having a fall break.

University Registrar Don Foster said that last year the football schedule was out, but the calendar committee was unaware of which games would be home and away. Then, the University Homecoming Committee chose the day for Homecoming, unaware that fall break was that same weekend.

All are understandable oversights. It was the first year, and there still were kinks to work out.

In the end, it just gave students more time to party Thursday night and show up hung over for the parade Friday.

So, you'd think that they would work all this out the next time, right? Close, but no cigar.

This year, fall break was the Friday before the Texas A&M home game.

Why can't we manage to plan fall break on a weekend with few university activities? If we were playing them on the road, I could see most people willing to enjoy the game on TV from the comfort of their home. But not Texas A&M at Wagner Field.

If it truly was intended to be a break from school and give students a chance to go home, it should not have been scheduled against such a heated K-State rival.

Students greatly benefit from a break in the fall. There's no debate about that. After the first couple rounds of tests, papers and midterms, most students' stress meters are running a little high.

We need to get out of the rut we've worked ourselves into and regain our perspective on why we should care about turning in our homework. So, how can we improve this situation to ensure that students get a real break?

First, the fact that we can only muster a single day for fall break is disappointing. Many out-of-state and western Kansas students have to drive four or more hours to go home to see their families. Having to drive eight hours in three days can be very taxing and could prohibit some students from going to see them.

One more day added in August and given back in October would balance out the workload and give students a chance to get away from school for a significant amount of time.

It also would give students a four-day weekend, similar to spring break's full week of rest and relaxation. We need time to decompress, and one day doesn't cut it.

If we were to get Thursday and Friday off, that would even the benefits for more students. If Thursdays are off limits, how about skipping school Friday and Monday? If any day could be cut from the week, Mondays should be the first to go. Even if we can only get one day, we should get Monday off.

Then, who cares if we have a home game? We can go home afterwards and drive back Monday night.

The biggest problem I have with fall break is it has conflicted with football home games for two years straight. For students who don't go to football games, this probably isn't an issue. But that still leaves 7,500 ticket-holding students frustrated with no real break in the fall.

Those students love football. K-State football. Despite a rough patch this year, most real fans are sticking to their guns, still screaming their heads off at bad calls and chanting K-S-U after scores.

The university aptly rewards those dedicated Wildcats with a fall break that tempts them to sell out and skip the game. That's wrong.

I'm glad the university had the forward thinking to finally include a break for the fall semester in the first place. It's unfortunate they have yet to book it on a weekend where it can be used and appreciated by all K-State students.

Hopefully, we can figure out a way for fall break to work next year for students, and maybe even include faculty and staff members. Goodness knows, they work as hard or harder than the students.

If we do, maybe then we can look at the fraud called dead week. But that's a whole different column.

LOCAL TALENT

Andrew Dueringer, second tenor in Cadence a capella singing group

Andrew Dueringer, senior in advertising, is the last remaining original member of Cadence, which started four years ago.

Cadence will be performing at 12:30 p.m. Friday in the K-State Student Union Courtyard.

Dueringer sings the part of second tenor in the group, which typically is the lead vocals, he said. The four parts are first tenor, second tenor, baritone and bass and Dueringer said each of the 12 members take on one of those roles. Occasionally, members take on the task of vocal percussion as well.

Dueringer, who has been performing since the age of 10, said the group tries to be more than just a singing group when they are on stage. They entertain the audience and interact with them to break down the wall between the performers and the people watching, he said.

This sets the group apart from normal vocal performing groups, Dueringer said.

"I like the intimacy of it," he said.

"People can identify with it, and we make eye contact with the audience. It's a more personal kind of performance."

Rockin' in Kansas

Web site brings attention to region's music

BY BECKY FISCHER
Kansas State Collegian

Kansas is home to many great musicians.

Now, there's a Web site to prove it.

RockKansas.com, launched Oct. 12, compiles past and present bands and musicians into one resource. RockKansas' editor, Phil Cauthon, graduate student in journalism at the University of Kansas, said one of his goals is to include as much Kansas musical talent as possible.

"Right now I've got 160 or 170 bands on the site," Cauthon said. "Twenty more acts just sent their information to me, and I'm after a couple dozen more."

Getting all the musicians onto the site is a difficult task, Cauthon said.

"You'd think musicians would be the biggest self-promoters in the world," he said. "They're not always. Some of them just care about playing their music and don't think about promoting. I'm trying to give them a kick in the ass."

New and current bands are important to the site, Cauthon said, but so are bands from Kansas' past.

"If you want to know about a defunct band, like Paw or even some '60s group, I want you to be able to find a page about them here," Cauthon said.

Band pages contain detailed information about a band. Each page contains reviews, band biographies and venues where the band has played or will play, Cauthon said. Some also contain MP3s available for downloading. The MP3s are put together to form an Internet radio station for the site, Cauthon said.

"This site is here to serve the local music scene," he said. "That includes not only informing people, but getting them to listen to the music and go out to shows. Since RockKansas is young, goals for it aren't set in stone, but I hope to take Kansas' music scene a step further."

A step further for some bands can simply mean getting their name out there, Cauthon said.

"There are plenty of talented bands from Kansas that no one knows about," he said. "While people are looking up an MTV act, like Kansas City's Puddle of Mudd, hopefully, they'll also check out some of the other groups at the site. I'd like to provide that opportunity for bands."

While Cauthon writes band pages and news articles himself, he said he also accepts writings from anyone else.

"Just send stuff to me," he said. "I want reviews and stories from lots of sources so the perspective is well-rounded."

The Topeka Capital-Journal provided generous opportunities for Cauthon, he said, in getting his position as editor of RockKansas. Cauthon had an internship at the paper last summer, and it was there he learned about the site.

"I've been gathering information on bands for a long time, and I'm still doing it," Cauthon said. "It's what I do for the site. The Topeka Capital-Journal devoted an unusually high amount of resources to its online product, and I'm glad to be part of this project."

The job is a pleasurable one, Cauthon said.

"It came together like it never does," he said. "It's a gift from God. I still go to school, but I find myself dedicating so many hours to this. Now I can see how people become totally immersed in their work, and time just disappears."

The site is something Rob Curly, director of new media for the Topeka

Capital-Journal, said he always has wanted to see become a reality.

"There's an amazing music scene here that's underappreciated," Curly said. "This site pays homage to it."

Curly said the site was created by people who wanted to know more about local music.

"I personally hate to go hear a cool band at a bar and not be able to get any of their music," he said. "Now you can come home from a show and download the stuff you just heard."

A printed edition of RockKansas is in the works, Curly said.

"It would be similar to the old Pitch Weekly out of Lawrence," he said. "We'd insert it into the paper and have free racks in different cities. It's just a way to reach more people."

Other ways to reach people and bring in information are being set up right now, Curly said.

"In the next couple of months, we'll be pulling in multimedia partners," he said. "We've brought in radio stations from KU and Topeka, and we're still looking for one in Manhattan. Our goal is to bring in information from a million different cool sources."

To celebrate its launch, RockKansas is throwing a party Monday at Abe and Jake's Landing in Lawrence, Cauthon said. Manhattan's Ultimate Fakebook headlines the event.

"We just recorded our third album, so we're looking forward to playing a few of our new songs," said Bill McShane, lead singer/guitarist for Ultimate Fakebook.

RockKansas is something Kansas musicians need, McShane said.

"The idea of the site is long overdue," he said. "There's so much going on locally with music, and people aren't even aware of it. People recognize bands from Manhattan or Lawrence that have made it big and tour nationally, but they may not even know they're from here. The site is a step in forming a rock community."

Monday's launching party hopefully will bring awareness to the site, Cauthon said. People should come dressed in their Halloween costumes for a chance to win cash prizes, Cauthon said.

"We've got a lot of stuff cooking for the party," Cauthon said. "I'd love to see a bunch of K-State faces. It's cheap, and it's going to be a great time."

ROAD ROMP OVER SOONERS

Wildcats defeat Oklahoma; continue winning streak

BY DAN SMITH

Kansas State Collegian

K-State is starting to get used to beating the University of Oklahoma.

In fact, it's been almost four years since the Sooners (2-17, 1-8) last outdid the Wildcats (11-5, 7-3), with Oklahoma's last win Oct. 31, 1998.

The Wildcats had a different head coach then, Jim McLaughlin, and current head coach Suzie Fritz was known as Suzie Weimers.

Outside hitter Liz Wegner was just a freshman that Halloween, but Oklahoma learned just how scary Wegner would become. The true freshman registered 14 digs and 23 kills that night in Norman, Okla., and the Grand Island, Neb., native has haunted the Sooners ever since.

Flash forward to Saturday night.

K-State was looking for its third straight season sweep of the Sooners at Howard McCasland Field House in Norman after beating Oklahoma in straight sets (30-13, 30-16, 30-23) Sept. 19 to open the Big 12 season, and again it was Wegner who would lead the charge.

This time, however, the win wouldn't come easily.

Oklahoma led by more than four points in game one, before the Wildcats shook off the rust of a five-day hiatus, but after they did, it got ugly. K-State rallied back to take its first lead 11-10 and scored five unanswered points with the score 13-12 to take its biggest lead of the set at 18-12. The Sooners closed the gap to four points late in the game, but couldn't overcome Wegner's six kills and four digs, and the Wildcats held on long enough to take the set 30-22.

"I thought we played well in game one, but they had more fire power," Oklahoma head coach Kalani Mahi said after the match.

K-State failed to capitalize on the momentum from the first game in the second set and struggled from the first serve.

But after the Wildcats took their first lead at 6-5, K-State scored the game's next six points and went on to lead by as many as 13 in the game. Fritz's squad would have trouble closing out the game too, squandering three game-point opportunities to the Sooner defense before taking the game 30-18.

"We were able to sidgout fairly easily, but we didn't pass well," Mahi said after the second game.

K-State held Oklahoma to a .048 hitting percentage in game two while managing to hit .326 on offense behind Wegner's team-high seven kills. Junior outside hitter Jenny Pollard was the star on defense, adding five digs in the game.

Game three was the Wildcats' most impressive performance of the night, posting a match-high .385 hitting percentage behind Pollard's team-high six kills. K-State used an early 4-1 lead to its advantage and led by as many as 14 in the set to beat the Sooners 30-17 and complete the season sweep.

Overall, the Wildcats outblocked (11-5-4), outhit (.348-.105), outdug (49-44) and outaced (7-1) the Sooners in the straight set win.

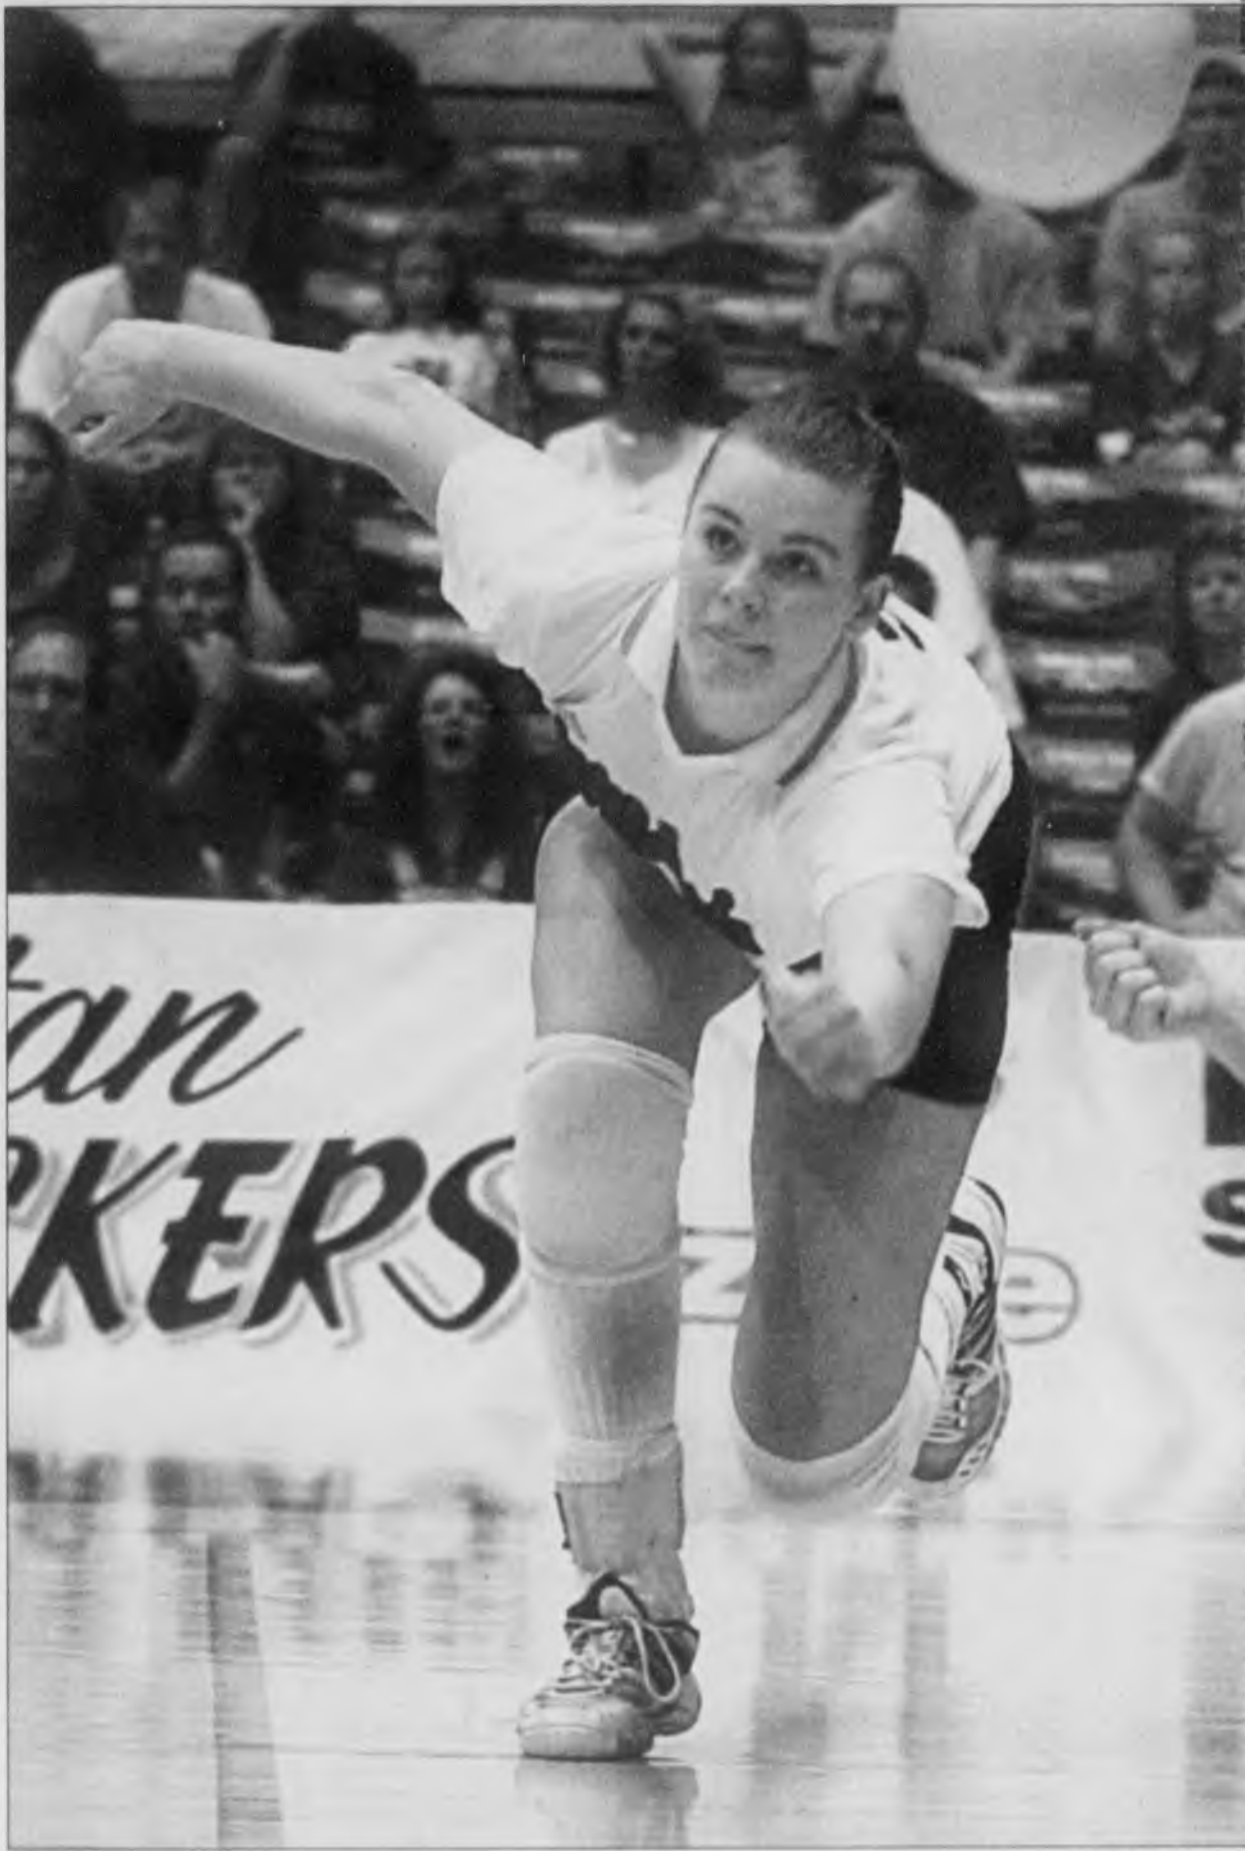

True freshman Gabby Guerre continued her progression in the starting lineup, tallying seven kills on .700 hitting. Guerre also led the team in assists with 35 and posted a season-high six blocks along with five digs and three service aces.

And although Wegner didn't quite have the day she had in 1998, the senior still did her damage — registering a team-high 15 kills on .414 hitting, and adding nine digs in the Wildcat win.

Malfunction fails to slow rowers in biggest regatta of '01 season

BY DAN SMITH

Kansas State Collegian

The K-State women's rowing program competed in its biggest regatta of the 2001 season last weekend in Boston, Mass.

The Head of the Charles regatta is billed as the largest two-day race in the world, boasting over 5,000 competitors and this year's running marked the Wildcats' largest head race of the year.

"It is a tremendous opportunity for us to compete with most of the other college crews in the country on a single day," head rowing coach Jenny Hale said prior to the race.

On Saturday, K-State's club 4+ entry made the most of that opportunity, finishing 13th in the 58-boat field. The boat, manned by sophomore Katie Baxter, senior Anne Hagerman, freshman Talara Wait, sophomore Elane Walker and junior Susie Truax, turned in a time of 20:4.

Among collegiate boats, K-State finished fifth, despite a costly mechanical malfunction during the race that jeopardized the team's performance.

"The girls had a very aggressive race," Hale said. "They had challenges to overcome, and they handled themselves well."

"The cox box, which is used to amplify the coxswain's commands, was broken," she said. "They couldn't hear the coxswain, but they handled it."

Handling the distraction with determination paid off for the team.

K-State's finish was within 4.6 percent of the first-place Saugatuck Rowing Club entry, which earned the team its first guaranteed entry into next year's Head of the Charles race.

"The guarantee entry is the first in the history of Kansas State rowing and is a huge accomplishment for the team," Hale said. "They showed tremendous heart today and proved that they were worthy of being the first club 4+ from K-State to ever compete

Next action

The K-State rowing team returns to action this weekend at the 11th annual Head of the Iowa regatta in Iowa City, Iowa. Last season, K-State took home first-place honors in Open Pairs rowing and finished fifth overall in the open 8+ race at the Head of the Iowa.

In Boston.

Another mistake hurt the Cats in the second-day of competition Sunday.

After one of the rowers on K-State's championship 8+ boat lost control of her oar in the first mile of the race, the boat lost position and finished a frustrating 24th out of 53 boats.

"Someone caught a crab, so that stopped the boat," Hale said. "You just can't make that kind of mistake."

"If you do, you have to recover using extraordinary measures, which we did not do," she said.

K-State's 24th-place finish came one week after the Open 8+ boat took first in the American Royal Fall Rowing Classic in Kansas City, Mo., with a time of 15:03.

On Sunday, however, it would be the US Rowing Club taking home first place honors, finishing with a time of 16:01.1. Princeton University and London Training Center rounded out the top three with times of 16:10.9 and 16:17.8, respectively.

After finishing 17th out of 57 boats last year in Boston, with a time of 17:38.36, the varsity boat battled back on Sunday to actually finish with a better time on the three-mile course (17:20.5) despite finishing farther back in the field.

"Mistakes are going to happen, and you have to learn from them," Hale said after the race. "We were clearly disappointed that they didn't row up to their potential. We beat ourselves today."

Diamondbacks possess dominant pitching; team on its way to winning World Series

My money's on the Jayhawks. So, you can go ahead and lynch me along with Dan Smith.

In addition to all that fun, you can turn on your televisions Saturday and see a nice, big Johnson.

Please, let me explain.

The Arizona Diamondbacks are headed to the World Series for the first time in their four year history.

Well, isn't that special? I feel the need to cheer for the D-Backs this year as they head to the Fall Classic on Saturday because they deserve it, or, something like that.

As the fastest expansion team ever to make it past the regular season, Arizona has so much going for them.

First and foremost, pitcher Randy Johnson, who leaves for the World Series with a postseason ERA of 1.88, not only has done great things for the Diamondbacks in the last three seasons, but he also is officially the ugliest man in baseball, bless his heart.

He finally won that title in my book of Major League Baseball grievances back in 1999 when the Braves' Otis Nixon (who, I swear, got broadsided with the ugly truck) became a free agent and, consequently, ended his career.

Congratulations, Randy, at the ripe old age of 38, you now have the gold (You've probably never seen a 6-foot-10 Johnson, have you?).

Hopefully, Johnson will be able to face his former team of 10 seasons — the Seattle Mariners — in the World Series, and keep the big game a west coast affair after the anticlimactic Big Apple series a year ago.

However, by the time this worthless column of mine reaches the presses, Seattle's opposition — the New York Yankees — might already have clinched the American League pennant.

Since the deadline from my fascist dictator of a sports editor for this column always is a day in advance, last night to you is tonight to me, so I don't know if the AL Championship Series will end 4-1 Yankees or continue with the tally 3-2. It's confusing, I know.

Screw the Yankees.

With enough money, you too can win four World Series titles in a row. Anyway, back to the 'Backs.

Johnson might be bigger (and hairier, seriously), but the guy who knows how to use it better might be Curt Schilling. It's not the size that counts anyway, right, ladies?

With more strikeouts and a better ERA than Johnson during the playoffs, Schilling looks like the better pitcher.

An ace-in-the-hole for Arizona, Schilling has brought the fire like Prometheus himself and thrown the heat all season long.

So, when it comes down to the big enchilada on the 27th, the Schilling will shine and the Johnson might not rise to the occasion (hey, the guy's probably nervous — it's his first time and all).

Aside from the pill-pitchers on the mound, another Arizona focal point would be 31-year-old utility player Craig Counsell, who penned quite a tale of heroic greatness in the NL Championship series.

Not even expected to make the team, Counsell humbly walked onto the field in the Spring, snagged his spot on the roster and WHAM — seven months later wins the National League Championship Series Most Valuable Player award. You all can line up to kiss his ass now.

Also putting some stats in the book lately is first baseman Mark Grace.

Grace is the third most active player to never reach a World Series, until now. With 2,055 games to his name, Grace ranks just under Barry Bonds and Rafael Palmeiro — although he's probably not too perturbed to fall short in that respect.

Injuring his hamstring in Game 5 of Championship Series, Grace had damned well better make it on the playing field Saturday or I just might pull his other hammy.

Whether it already is decided that the Yankees will face the Diamondbacks in the 2001 World Series or if the window of opportunity for Seattle is still open, I will cheer for the D-Backs and indignantly jeer their opponents.

It is time for Arizona to raise some hell.

Step aside for the snakes.

donate her blood this year.

"I passed out last time," she said.

"If I have time to eat a lot, I might."

The student volunteers again escorted the donors after they finished donating to the U Room, where Russell or another housemom were waiting to feed them doughnuts and juice.

When students finished eating and drinking and were preparing to leave, Russell still tried to give them more doughnuts.

"You can stick one in your pocket," she said. "They travel well."

As Jackson ate doughnuts and drank orange juice, he said it was his third time to donate blood, so he said he thought the whole process was easy. For Matt Ast, junior in marketing and German, giving blood Monday was a first-time occurrence.

"It didn't hurt as bad as I thought it would," he said. "Seeing my blood kind of freaks me out — and the huge needle."

Ast was one of many members who helped his house, Delta Tau Delta, gain Homecoming points by giving blood.

Chris Blanton, Specialist II, said about 15 workers came from Wichita to help with the blood drive in the Union. He, however, works locally. He said he has worked as a blood specialist for about a year and a half.

"It's a good job. It's the best job I've ever had," he said. "It's nice to be the middle man. Donating blood's healthy for the people giving it, and it's definitely healthy and helpful for the people receiving it."

"So, it's nice to be a part of that."

Blanton said he works from about 9:45 a.m. to about 5:15 p.m. — although the drive lasts from 10:30 a.m. to 4:30 p.m. — each day this week.

Russell said she will work again Thursday and probably at the next blood drive. Giving blood is an incredible thing to do, she said.

"It's a neat thing," she said. "I can't give any more. I did — I gave up to several gallons when I was younger, but, I think it's great."

Bush said the executive mansion was safe — and twice said,

"I don't have anthrax" — despite the discovery of spores on a machine at the mail site a few miles from the White House. Spokesman Ari Fleischer said all employees at the site as well as mailroom workers in the White House itself were being swabbed and tested for the disease.

Hall placed

Joe Hall was arrested Monday for probation violations, his fourth legal problem within the last year.

Hall, K-State football running back, started probation in December after being convicted of falsely reporting a crime.

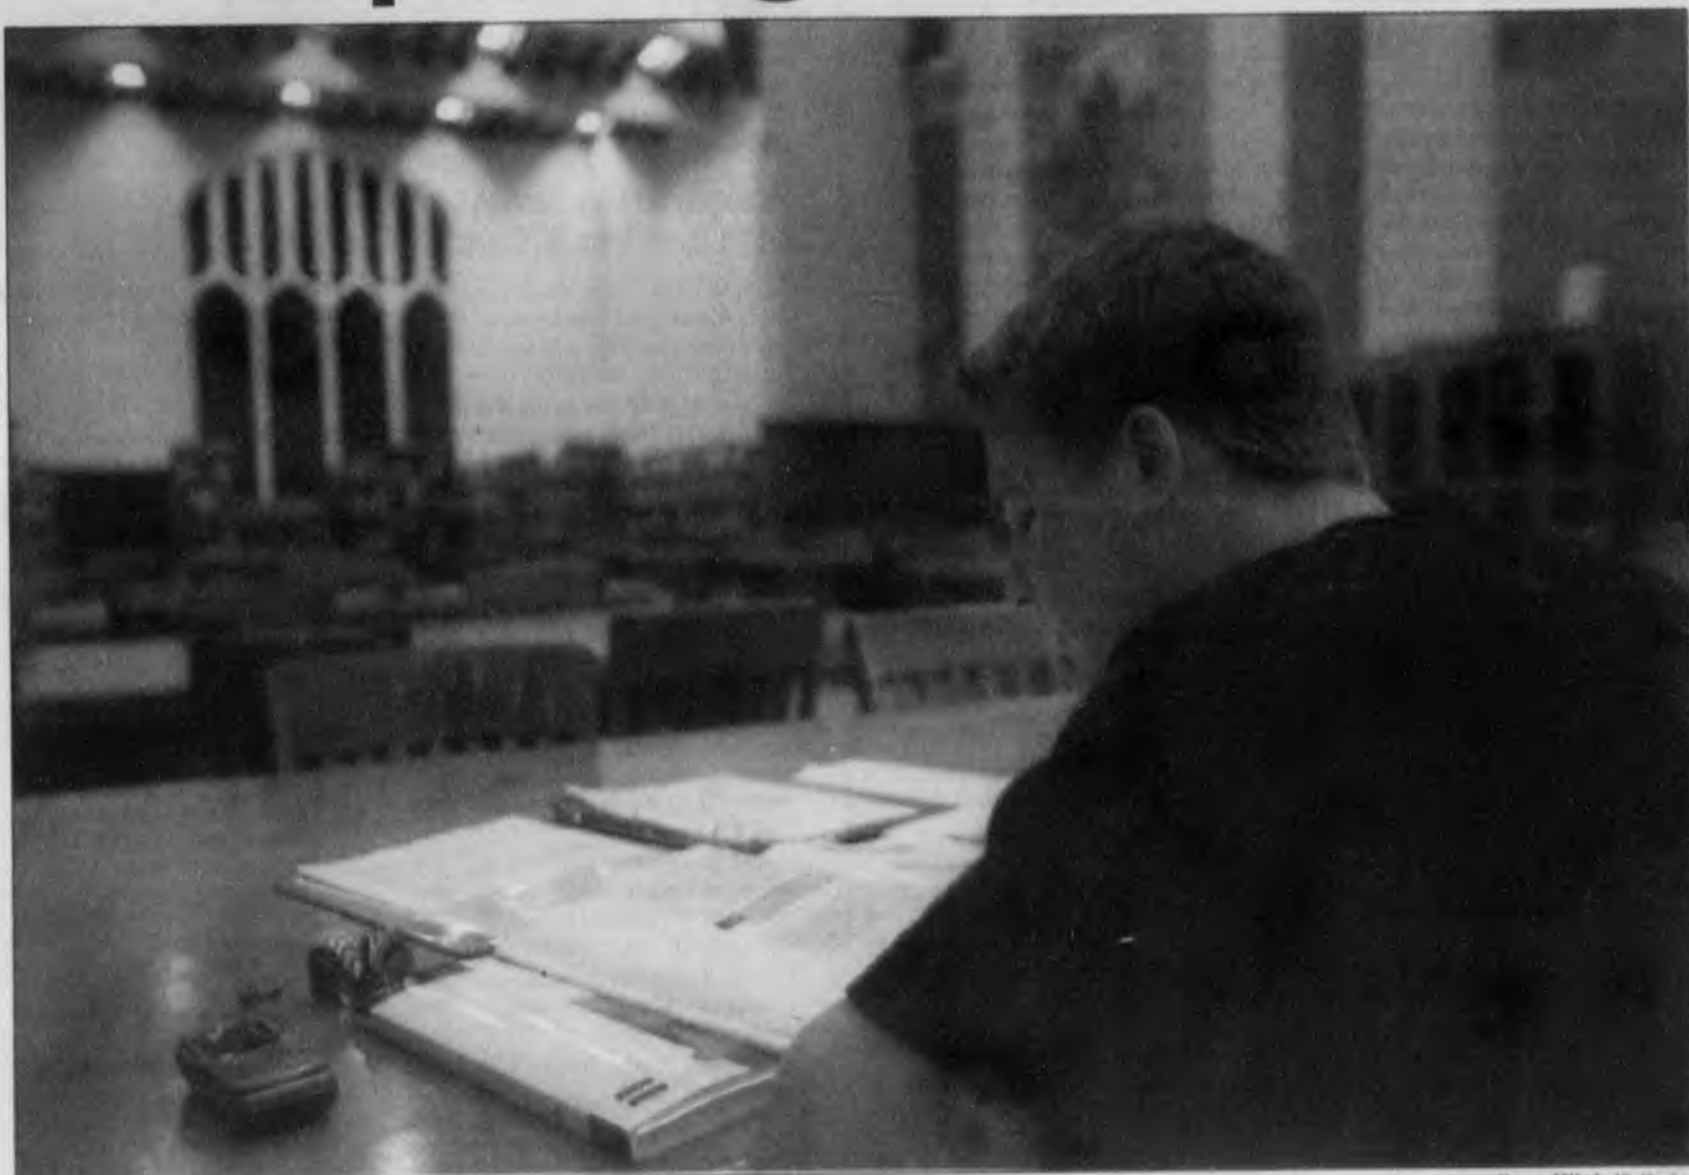

The Riley County district attorney's office alleges he violated several terms of the nine-month probation. Violations include failure to pay $136 in court costs, failure to report to his probation officer, failure to complete 50 hours of community service and a March charge of driving on a suspended license.

Last fall, the 300-pound back was charged with minor in possession.

Bill Snyder, head football coach, said Tuesday he was under the impression that Hall met with his probation officer last week for his last session. Snyder said he's still trying to find out the facts.

Integrating new technology part of Hale's vision

BY MICHAEL WATSON
Kansas State Collegian

Hale Library is working toward a vision. Brice Hobrock, dean of libraries, said the vision is to help students and faculty with their information needs and to link them to global information resources.

K-State's vision

The future and present of K-State and Manhattan will be outlined throughout the semester. Look for future stories in the Wednesday editions of the Collegian.

"We have three priorities," he said. "No. 1 is to assess user needs, and to provide services that students and faculty require. No. 2 is to develop the digital library and develop an integrated resource discovery system. No. 3 is the large, unique collection of information resources."

The larger collection of information resources will include books, periodicals and other resources. Hobrock said it will give students access to literally everything out there.

Hale has 150 computer work stations, part of the university's 600 computer work station image.

"We will be adding 50 more work stations as soon as the furniture arrives," Hobrock said. "The computers are already here."

Laurel Littrell, humanities librarian and chairperson of the InfoCommons Task Force, said 49 new computers were installed in different places in Hale in September. They have flat screens and are like laptops, but with full-size keyboards.

"We bought them because they fit into the study carols," she said. "It saved lots of money on furniture and wiring."

These computers were paid for with the student bond money that the Student Senate assessed last year. Part of the $1 million went to the InfoCommons in the library, and the rest will be used to resurface Memorial Stadium and renovate Forum Hall in the K-State Student Union.

Littrell said the 50 new computers will be installed in some of the existing carols. Some new carols also are being ordered.

"The furniture is being paid for out of a separate fund," she said. "Students aren't paying for that."

The library also is integrating a wireless connection. The connection will give users access to all of the university's assets through laptop computers.

"We have the funding. It's a matter of getting it installed," Littrell said. "We're identifying places in the building for antennas. Then we have to power the antennas. It will hopefully be done sometime this semester."

Littrell said 10 of the new machines are laptops. There will be a total of 14 laptops that students can check out.

"We tried four last year. It was kind of slow starting, but it's picking up," she said. "Hopefully, we will be able to get more if we need more."

One more aspect of Hale's technology vision is a Student Development Center. The center will have higher-end equipment like compact disc burners, scanners and color printers.

"It's beyond what you can do at a regular work station."

Littrell said nothing has been developed yet. The library is working with the Information Technology Assistance Center to get the center moving.

"We have partial funding," she said. "But there are a lot of details that need to be worked out."

The new computers and the wireless technology were paid for with the Student Technology Fee last year, Littrell said. The fee was a three-year program, and the three years are up. Some of the senators are trying to reinstate the fee.

"We are still questioning where we are going to get funds," she said.

Hobrock said K-State should have a goal to become a member of the Association of Research Libraries. He said Hale is about 10 years away from meeting the criteria, but the library has a vision for improvement.

ARL membership requires a broad base of collections and services, a university that emphasizes research and graduate instruction at the doctorate level and that grants its own degrees and gives evidence of commit-

Strategic goals

1. Provide users the services they need at a level of quality that consistently meets or exceeds their expectations.
2. Enhance information resources holdings of the library, as well as the information systems and technology infrastructure.
3. Optimize the electronic access infrastructure for all users — local and distant.
4. Effectively utilize partnering with on-campus units and library consortia to advance capabilities and services at competitive cost levels.
5. Value input from library faculty and staff and provide for their professional development and continuing education.
6. Enhance the image of the library nationally, statewide and on campus to warrant a greatly improved stature and recognition.
7. Expand sources of funding, thus expanding the nature and quality of services to users.

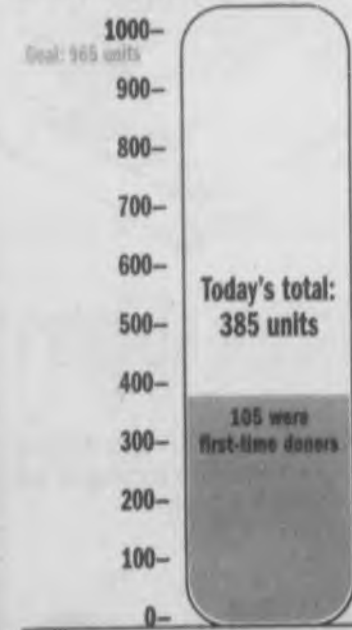

ment to advancement and transmittal of knowledge.

Hobrock said the library worked with the Privilege Fee Committee for two years and got limited progress.

It was determined that money for Hale was a tuition fee, not a privilege fee. The Student Governing Association approved a tuition fee of $1 per credit hour.

"It contributes to a favorable capacity we have today," Hobrock said. "ARL is a separate strategy. My guess is that it would be $8 to Coloring in the lines had its own role in this week's All-University Homecoming festivities at the Paint the 'Ville contest Tuesday.

Students painted the windows of 18 Aggieville businesses from noon to 6 p.m. Participating groups were organized into three divisions: fraternities and sororities, residence halls and student organizations.

The top five greek and student organizations and the top four residence hall groups will earn points toward this week's overall Homecoming competition.

Judges were selected members of the campus and community, said Missy Decker-Heidrick, associated director of alumni programs.

Winning the competition requires meeting specific criteria, said Wes Garrison, member of the Homecoming

Farmers setting records for wheat crops planted

WICHITA — Kansas farmers have planted 96 percent of their 2002 winter wheat crop, Kansas Agricultural Statistics Service said Monday.

That is well above the 82 percent planted last year. It also is above the five-year average of 90 percent for this time of year, the agency said in its weekly crop weather report.

About 85 percent of the crop has already emerged.

Crop condition was rated as 1 percent very poor, 3 percent poor, 24 percent fair, 60 percent good and 12 percent excellent.

Wheat stands are rated mostly fair or better in all districts, but dry conditions in the western districts will lead to deterioration in wheat stands if moisture is not received soon, the statistics service said.

Washburn gets $2.2 million from local woman's estate

TOPEKA — Washburn University has received a bequest of $2.2 million from a woman who had no known connection to the school.

"This gift was a complete surprise to us," Lee Benson, interim president of Washburn's Endowment Association, said of the gift from the estate of Zola Desmond.

"Even though we did not know Zola during her lifetime, this gift speaks of her belief in what Washburn is trying to accomplish."

Desmond, a widow who died in July at 85, had moved to Topeka from Denver 17 years ago.

Her bequest, the second-largest ever given to Washburn, establishes scholarships for underprivileged and deserving Washburn students.

Lindy Ericson, vice president and trust officer for Commerce Bank and Trust, said Desmond years ago chose Washburn as the chief beneficiary of her estate. Although she never attended college, she valued education and wanted to help students, Ericson said.

AT&T to lay off 2,400 jobs as streamlining continues

NEW YORK — AT&T Corp. is cutting an additional 2,400 jobs, bringing this year's total to more than 8,000, or more than 6 percent of its work force, The Wall Street Journal reported Tuesday.

The telecommunications giant's decision comes as other streamlining takes place within the industry.

On Monday, SBC Communications said it will cut several thousand jobs. BellSouth and Sprint have announced plans to cut 3,000 and 6,000 workers, respectively.

The Journal cited the Communications Workers of America as saying that 2,400 union jobs will be cut.

AT&T spokeswoman Eileen Connolly declined Tuesday to comment on the specifics of the newspaper report but said AT&T has been reducing its employee base mainly through attrition over the past many months.

She said there have been thousands of recent job cuts in the company's cable TV division, AT&T Broadband.

AT&T has been grappling with falling long-distance rates, increasing competition and customers switching to cellular, AT&T spokesman John Heath said.

Headquarters for Nasdaq might move from WTC area

NEW YORK — The Nasdaq Stock Market said Tuesday it is considering moving its headquarters to midtown Manhattan from its location next door to the World Trade Center ruins.

The office is a small piece of the electronic market's operations, employing 127 people, or 10 percent of its total work force. But a move from 1 Liberty Plaza would make Nasdaq the second major company to leave the area since the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks.

Earlier this month, Lehman Brothers Holdings Inc. said it would purchase a new million-square-foot office from Morgan Stanley Dean Witter & Co. near Times Square.

Lehman workers were displaced from the headquarters at the World Financial Center. The company has said it is committed to returning to downtown Manhattan though it remains unclear when.

Nasdaq's move would be more permanent.

K-STATE NEWSMAKERS Engineering chapter recognized

American Institute of Chemical Engineers

For the seventh year in a row, the K-State chapter of AIChE (American Institute of Chemical Engineers) was recognized as one of the top 10 collegiate chapters in the nation.

The award is given annually based on several areas such as academic excellence, community service, national scholarship awards and national and regional attendance. AIChE president Otto Romer said it was a great honor to win this award.

"It makes us feel very good because we were competing with a lot of universities like MIT and other big universities," he said. "To be from K-State and win this makes us feel very good — very proud."

Romer said a large focus of AIChE at K-state is community service. The group has involvement in Adopt-A-Family during the holiday season as well as participation in Habitat for Humanity.

He said the award was not a surprise after receiving it the last six consecutive years.

He did say, however, that being nationally recognized still was an accomplishment and something to strive for from year to year.

"We always try to better ourselves from the year before," he said.

Three campus organizations with current and past leadership positions:

- Alpha Xi Delta Sorority — Recruitment Counselor; Co-New Member Orientation Chair; Senior Activities Coordinator; House Mom/Out-of-House Liaison; Peer Mentor
- Greeks Advocating the Mature Management of Alcohol (GAMMA) — Vice President & Sorority Representative
- Multicultural Student Honor Society — Vice President; President
- Community Outreach and Work Experience:

- K-State Summer Orientation Leader
- KSU Academic Decathlon Judge — Prepared Speech, Impromptu Speech, Interview
- Girl Scouts of America — Summer Camp Head Counselor

Question and Answer:

Q: In one sentence, why do you want to be a KSU Ambassador?

A: I would love the opportunity to share my undergraduate experiences with prospective students and alumni in order to increase K-State's already wonderful reputation.

Q: Twenty years from now, as a KSU alumna, what will you remember about being a K-State student?

A: I don't know that I will ever be able to forget how proud I am to be a Wildcat, even after 20 years. I will not only remember attending football games with purple pride radiating from the washable tattoo on my face, but I will remember every event I ever attended as a K-State student. From orientation to graduation, everyone in attendance glows with pride for their alma mater. As an undergraduate student, Purple Pride surrounds me, and as alum, I will never forget that.

Odyssey dove over Mars' north pole and dipped behind the planet after the burn began, leaving mission team members waiting anxiously. About 20 minutes later, the probe reappeared and transmitted a signal to Earth across 93 million miles of space.

Scientists did not expect to know for up to three hours the exact orbital path the boxy spacecraft was traveling around Mars.

The Mars Odyssey, which reached Mars after a six-month, 286 million-mile journey from Earth, is the first mission to the planet since two NASA failures in 1999. For the space agency, the project represented a shot at redemption.

"It's great. It's wonderful. We're back at Mars," said Daniel McCleese, chief scientist of the JPL Mars program. "The orbit looks even better than the predictions. It's really good."

A spacecraft's transition from interplanetary cruising to arrival has proven to be one of the most challenging phases in the exploration of Mars.

In 1993, contact with NASA's Mars Observer was lost as the satellite neared Mars, probably after a fuel-system explosion. Six years later, a mix-up between English and metric units in calculating trajectory put the Climate Orbiter too close to Mars, causing it to burn up in the atmosphere. The Polar Lander vanished three months later, probably because a software error caused it to plunge to the surface.

The back-to-back losses in 1999 underscored the difficulty of getting to Mars: Fewer than one-third of the 30 missions launched to the planet by the United States and other countries since 1960 have succeeded.

HOMECOMING

Some students were busy working as the deadline neared. Members of Kappa Kappa Gamma, Tau Kappa Epsilon and Sigma Phi Epsilon still were painting the window of Hair Experts Design Team on Anderson at 5:30 p.m.

The team was replicating its Homecoming T-shirt design. A large copy of it was taped behind the window.

"We started working around noon, and we already had an overhead to work from," said Casey Wallerstedt, junior in fashion design and member of Kappa Kappa Gamma sorority. "It is basically like coloring in the page, which makes it easier for the people who are coming and going."

Wallerstedt said her sorority sisters persuaded her to compete.

"I am artistic and good with design and colors," she said.

The T-shirt design was a good choice because of its appearance, Wallerstedt said.

"It is unique, eye-catching and fun to look at," she said.

Judging took place Tuesday night after the painting was completed. Winners will be announced tonight at the Pant the Chant competition, along with the winners of spirit signs and Crazy Cat Kickoff, Decker-Heidrick said.

Support needed for additional library growth

Hale Library has a vision. It wants to meet student, faculty and staff expectations for information needs and to link them to global information resources, but also wants to become a member of the Association of Research Libraries.

Brice Hobrock, dean of libraries, said Hale has come a long way in the past few years with its funding. Through the increased funding from the state, a one-time, three-year student fee, the foundation and a percentage of research overhead, Hale has implemented the Information Commons and also has been able to add more books, journals and research sources to its stacks.

Hobrock said K-State and Baylor University are the only two Big 12 schools that are not in the Association of Research Libraries. While our resources have increased, we still have a long way to go to become an accredited research library. Hobrock said it would take a 50 percent increase in funding.

The faculty and the president have made it clear that they want the library to have the dire funding it needs, Hobrock said. While we are the ones who use and utilize much of the technology in Hale, we need to do our part and support the library with its funding needs.

Hale has a vision — to better serve us. It is time for the Student Senate to examine once again what we need to do to better serve it.

Campus office provides aid for rental property tenants

Editor,

We are writing in response to the off-campus housing article printed Oct. 17. We represent the Consumer and Tenant Affairs (CTA) Office in the Office of Student Activities and Services on the ground floor of the K-State Student Union.

Although the article indicated that the future of off-campus housing is uncertain, there are a few certainties the students can expect.

Students can expect the CTA office, Student Senate and Manhattan Code Services to continue to fight for the rights of students who live in rental properties, to make sure that those properties are up to code and that landlords fulfill their obligations to renters.

If you are living in unsatisfactory conditions or feel you need someone to talk to regarding your current living conditions, we can advise you on the options to help improve your situation.

We urge you to call and make an appointment with us at 532-6541 before situations get worse or if you have any questions at all. Often, situations are much easier to deal with and will yield more positive outcomes if the problems are identified and dealt with early.

As the Editorial Board's column mentioned, another step is to contact the Fire Department's division of Code Services at 587-4506 to set up an appointment to have your place looked at. The inspection is free, and the Code inspector will look for violations and contact your landlord.

If violations are found, your landlord will have a certain amount of time to fix the problems before you can consider any alternative actions.

If you are having trouble finding housing now, we have an Off-Campus Housing Guide available in the CTA office. The guide includes specific rental properties in Manhattan. You can compare the rental properties by price, location and features. The guide also has important phone numbers for setting up services, an apartment budget sheet and a move-in checklist.

Consumer and Tenant Affairs services are free to all K-State students, faculty and staff. Our office can provide information on landlord and tenant rights and responsibilities.

Cosmetic surgery can be harmful; measures often taken to extreme

Too many people are making themselves into human Mr. Potato Heads. The fountain of youth is now equipped with a human fat flowbee and silicone pillows.

We are in a world of lifting, tucking, suctioning and implanting. According to the American Society for Aesthetic Plastic Surgery, in 2000, there were 5.7 million cosmetic surgical and nonsurgical procedures performed. Baby boomers, people between the ages of 35 to 50, accounted for 43 percent of that figure. The second highest group was 19- to 34-year-olds, who accounted for 25 percent of the patients.

In 1999, American plastic surgeons performed nearly 822,000 facelifts, eyelid surgeries, breast augmentations, liposuctions and tummy tucks. Women accounted for 728,000 of that figure.

I wonder how many of those women went in looking like Bea Arthur with expectations of leaving looking like Britney Spears. On the other hand, I would place money on the notion there are a lot of teen-aged girls who have had cosmetic surgery and then ended up regretting their choices. Some of them probably wish they would have left their bodies the way they were made instead of trying to create a new image.

Granted, cosmetic surgery has improved, but there still are great risks involved, risks such as excessive bleeding, infection, surgical complications, injury to the wound after surgery and heavy scarring.

The question no longer is what can be fixed, but more importantly — what can't be?

It is similar to a fast-food place. I can just picture a gum-smacking, beehive-wearing old lady, asking, "Did you want your breasts enlarged with implants or the lift? For a few extra thousand, you can get those reconstructed."

"Oh, you want the number four? That's the tummy tuck, eyebrow transplant and the power cannula liposuction. Now, with the lipo did you want the liposculpture or liposhaving? And did you want that mini-sized?"

In middle school, you weren't cool unless you had designer jeans. Did you know they have designer vaginas? Nothing like a Gucci ... You get the point.

For those men out there who aren't equipped like a rented donkey from Mexico or Dirk Diggle, there are penile extensions offered. In the October issue of Maxim, it states this type of surgery, along with the widening, can cost a minimum of $9,000. Imagine if the surgeon accidentally thought you wanted a reduction.

Even though I am using humor, there can be such serious complications for these surgeries.

These surgeries only offer temporary fixes. Underneath the silicone, the facelifts and the new physical image, a fragile self-esteem still might exist.

When a person is involved in an accident, reconstructive surgery is acceptable. It is fair for the individual to change his or her image after a negative experience has altered it.

There also is a difference between someone who gets one thing done versus trying to change his or her whole image.

Beauty is found in imperfections. It is what separates people and makes them interesting. Our natural scars tell stories. The lines on our faces are from laughter. True beauty cannot be store-bought.

It is a shame we are so focused on our physical appearance we forget about so many other important things. Instead of reading classic novels, some read only plastic surgery pamphlets. And it shows. Some are too busy trying to defy time, and they end up wasting their lives under the knife.

As much fun as the game, "What's real, and what's fake?" can be, it shows the overall lack of acceptance.

While it might be entertaining for Mr. Potato Head to try new looks, underneath it all he still is just a potato.

Whoever teepeed the Kappa Delta house Sunday should be mighty proud of themselves. That is one of the best jobs I've seen in my life.

Left lane is for passing. All you slow

Procedures boost patient confidence, yield improvements in medical field

I'm really content with my body. Sure, my fondness for beer has added a few too many pounds to my frame, and I'll pass out if I try to walk across campus. But all in all, I wouldn't change my appearance given the chance.

That's not to say there aren't reasons why some people would want to change their looks. Cosmetic surgery is one of several options available for these individuals.

Perhaps the most important benefit of cosmetic surgery is, its potential to increase health. Breast reductions, for instance, might relieve back pains and posture problems for some women.

An additional reason to have plastic surgery is to improve physical appearance.

Now, some will say all people have the ability to accept their appearance and be comfortable with the body God gave them. They insist external form really doesn't matter.

While this would be the ideal, unfortunately, this just isn't the case. First impressions are very important in the society in which we live. Whether you're looking for a job or for a potential spouse, your initial appearance matters.

A study in psychology by Karen Dion, Ellen Berscheid and Elaine Walster titled "What's Beautiful Is Good" proves this point. The research experiment had test subjects judge traits of individuals based simply on their physical appearance.

The results show that attractive people are viewed as having a better chance at marriage, a higher chance at being happy and an increased probability of obtaining a job when compared to unattractive people.

Are these snap judgments fair? Of course not, but that's the way humans are.

We make decisions about others based on their appearance. In fairness, first impressions aren't the be-all, end-all in this world. Goodness, honesty and work ethic aren't shown in beauty.

Successful careers and happy marriages are obtainable by all who seek them. The point I'm trying to make is — a pretty exterior might make the journey a little easier.

Another reason to change looks is for self-confidence. A small alteration might make an individual feel better about himself or herself.

Dr. Robert Yoho puts it best when he says, "A larger pair of breasts does not guarantee that a woman will attract the man of her dreams."

A new head of hair does not guarantee that a man will be the center of attention at a party. But the combination of better looks and a positive response from other people can produce more personal confidence and effectiveness.

You might be like me and like your body's imperfections now. But how would you feel if you were involved in a horrific car accident? Wouldn't you want to look like you did before the accident? Reconstructive surgery, a form of cosmetic surgery, would be the answer. Now, if you're still against plastic surgery but you think you could support reconstructive surgery (such as surgery to repair damage after an accident), consider this: New techniques and practices are being discovered all the time through cosmetic surgery. As the rich pay for nose jobs, facelifts and chin augmentations, the procedures become more and more precise. As the techniques improve, their efficiency in reconstructive surgery increases as well. Just think of cosmetic surgery as a way for surgeons to practice for reconstructive surgery.

Changing your body certainly is not a decision to be taken lightly. No matter what kind of surgery it is, there always is a chance it will fail or have negative side effects. Also, it might be difficult or impossible to undo what was once done. I would strongly recommend anyone considering cosmetic surgery to do a lot of reflection and research before proceeding.

As for me, I'll stick with buying light beer instead of investing in a tummy tuck.

City's road conditions expected to improve this winter

BY ALYSON RALETZ
Kansas State Collegian

Gaping potholes covered the streets of Manhattan last winter. During the summer, though, the city took precautions for this winter.

Chuck Williams, assistant director of public works, blamed the poor road conditions on the unusually harsh weather bringing severe freeze and thaw cycles.

"Last year was certainly one of our harder winters," Williams said. "There was more moisture last year, which froze overnight in the cracks of the streets. As the water expanded, it broke up pavement material. In Kansas, we get a lot of freeze and thaw, which causes problems."

According to the National Weather Service report, this year's winter will be just as harsh, bringing low temperatures and high precipitation.

Even though this winter should bring similar weather, Williams said Manhattan residents should not anticipate the same pothole problems.

"We think we have taken care of a lot of our problem areas through our street maintenance efforts," he said.

In August, public works crews began an extensive milling project replacing the damaged asphalt on the streets south and east of campus. This project had been planned, he said, but the department made modifications because of winter.

Also, the city maintained streets south of Poyntz Avenue and 17th Street this summer by using a rejuvenating agent, which acted as a seal on the asphalt.

"Those streets were already in good condition," he said.

"We wanted to keep them that way, and we are doing everything we can to prevent future potholes."

He said that despite city efforts, there still will be some areas in Manhattan that will experience potholes this winter.

"Since Kimball is being scheduled to be rebuilt next year, we did not spend a lot of time on it," he said. "We will just have to work on it throughout the winter."

When potholes are discovered during the winter, he said, crews use cold patch, an asphalt material, to patch the hole, which is only a temporary fix.

"It stays pretty well, but we will patch the same pothole seven or eight times during the winter. This is usually pretty normal."

As the winter weather arrives in December, he said, potholes accompany it. Manhattan residents can report potholes by calling the Public Works Street Department at 587-4540, or they can go online and report them at www.ci.manhattan.ksu.us.

"Besides reporting them, there is not much residents can do about potholes," he said. "Yes, traffic beats the material out of the potholes, but traffic can't be stopped."

Jess Ebert, manager of Wildcat Amoco, said potholes can damage vehicles seriously.

"Last year, we received a lot of complaints," Ebert said. "It was worse than any other year."

He said they can bend rims, cause tire blowouts, bend lower control arms and sub frames, knock the exhaust loose and basically knock off the whole alignment of a car.

"These can be very small or major problems," he said.

"To get these things fixed, it can take anywhere from $250 to $600."

Unfortunately, he said, there

Mike Shepherd/Collegian

The unusually rough weather last winter damaged roads on campus and in Manhattan. The damage caused traffic inconvenience and vehicle wear. Manhattan city officials have anticipated another harsh winter and have taken measures to prevent a recurrence of potholes.

are very few precautions drivers can take during the winter if they are worried about potholes.

"There's nothing you can do," he said. "If you hit one, you hit one."

Drivers can, however, make sure their tires are aired to prevent blowouts, he said. Also, drivers should be more aware of new noises their vehicles make.

"If anything weird is happening that didn't happen before like vibrations or you are hearing noises that you never heard before, get it checked out," he said.

"Most likely, something is out of alignment, but with pothole damage, it could always be more serious."

State unemployment drops despite slowing national economy

BY JOHN MILBURN
The Associated Press

TOPEKA — Statewide unemployment inched lower in September despite the national slowdown associated with the terrorist attacks, officials said Tuesday.

Kansas' unemployment rate was down 0.1 percent to 3.6 percent last month from 3.7 percent in August, according to figures from the Department of Human Resources. The September figure also is lower than the 3.7 percent for the same month in 2000.

"This was expected because it normally takes a while for a state to feel the impact of a national event," Richard Beyer, secretary of human resources, said. "Although Kansas will not escape the effects, as many layoffs have occurred and will occur in the future, we are confident that the Kansas economy will remain strong."

The good news in September was attributed to the 16,800 new jobs in government, as non-teaching personnel returned for the start of the school year. Nearly all the 400 transportation-utilities jobs were tied to education, with bus drivers beginning school routes.

Seasonal decreases in construction projects resulted in a loss of 1,300 jobs, while manufacturing continued its slide, shedding 1,400 jobs, officials said.

Overall, non-farm payroll grew by 14,500 jobs in September to 1.36 million. Three of the four metropolitan areas of the state saw declines in unemployment. Lawrence, Wichita and the Kansas portion of the Kansas City metro area all declined by 0.1 percent in September, while Topeka was steady at 3.6 percent, compared to 4.1 percent in 2000.

Doniphan County had the highest rate in the state at 10.3 percent, due to a temporary loss of manufacturing jobs. Other counties with high unemployment included Linn at 6.9 percent and Woodson at 7.7 percent. Finney County also remained high at 6.7 percent as the area continues to recover from a fire in December 2000 at the ConAgra Beef Company plant.

The statewide layoffs in manufacturing do not include the nearly 5,000 jobs that have been announced by the aircraft industry in Wichita, said Bill Layes, chief of labor market information for the state. In addition, telecommunications giant Sprint announced 3,000 workers would lose their jobs by mid-December.

Layes said the department has projected that with seasonal fluctuations and the gradual layoff of aircraft workers that the state unemployment rate would approach 4.25 percent next year, still below the current national rate of 4.9 percent.

"But those workers are averaging about $50,000 a year, so it is going to have an effect on the economy with a wage loss of that size," Layes said.

Historically, September unemployment rates decline slightly or remain steady, Layes said, then increase after the start of the new year with the layoffs of seasonal workers, particularly in retail sales.

In 2000, the state added 700 retail jobs in September as employers geared up for the holidays, he said.

However, this year the number stayed firm at 322,600, a reflection of a slowing economy and uncertainty.

Kansas should be able to weather the economic slowdown and ripple effects of the Sept. 11 attacks, Layes said, because the state has done a better job of diversifying its work force.

Even with the hits taken by the aircraft industry, the Wichita economy remains strong, he said.

"We've had four or five years of good news. This is the first bad news we've had in a long time," Layes said.

Running south

Mortimer, Kimeli expected leaders at weekend championship

BY SEAN PURCELL
Kansas State Collegian

K-State cross country will travel south to Oklahoma in hopes of bringing home a Big 12 championship this weekend.

For the women, top finishes have come to be expected.

Amy Mortimer will lead the women's team Saturday as K-State strives to capture the Big 12 crown for the first time since 1998. Mortimer has recorded four individual wins this year. The most recent came when Mortimer finished 11 seconds ahead of her closest competitor to win the Chili Pepper Cross Country Festival on Oct. 13.

"Amy has been very steady with her training," head coach Randy Cole said. "She has raced with a lot of poise and confidence. She is excited about being in the hunt for a conference title. I truly believe she will be right there and hopefully come out on top."

Mortimer said she doesn't plan on training or preparing any different for this race from any others. And with four wins under her belt, that might be the best course of action, she said.

"I can't focus on running faster than I have before just because it is the Big 12 championship," she said. "I have to treat this race like I do any other."

But to win the conference title, all runners will be expected to step up, running mate Amanda Crouse-Behnke said.

The team has raced consistently well so far, finishing every race in the top five this fall.

"It is going to take all the girls running together," Crouse-Behnke said. "Staying with your teammates and communicating with them is always key."

Crouse-Behnke said the Big 12 Championship race, with a considerably smaller field of 12 teams, will allow the team to stay closer together and communicate throughout the race. K-State has been accustomed to competing against fields featuring as many as 30 teams this year.

"Conference is big for us," she said. "It will be exciting to see how well we will do."

On the men's side, the team has stumbled upon tough times with Mathew Kimutai still nursing a foot injury. Cole said he looks for Kimutai to place possibly in the top 15 or 20, but said he hopes to see another strong performance from Shadrack Kimeli.

"Our goals are to have Shadrack in the top three to four spots," he said, "then have Mathew in the top 20 and Reid Christianson, Derek George and Erik Spill finish in the top 45. With that type of finish, we could end up in the upper half of the conference."

Cole said the men's team has the potential to finish strong, but have yet to pull it all together so far.

But the Cats' coach said his team's struggles so far could work to its advantage.

"The positives for the men are that we have not put together a total race yet," he said. "If we are really hitting together, then we could place in the top two or three teams."

The men's 8,000-meter race is scheduled for 10 a.m. with the women's 6,000-meter race to follow at 11 a.m. Austin Golf Course in Norman, Okla., will be the site of the race.

Cole said he is ready to see if both teams can put together solid team races.

"This is what you have been building for the whole year," he said. "We're excited to be battling for the top positions."

Amy Mortimer leads a pack of K-State cross country runners at Warner Park last season. The Wildcats will compete in the Big 12 championship this weekend in Norman, Okla.

Rankings: one less worry for fans

I can't speak for anyone but myself, but this semester is starting to drag.

Projects, tests, concerts for music listening lab, adviser appointments, enrollment and trying to secure a summer internship are the things I am attempting to balance right now — emphasis on 'attempting.' I'm fairly certain most of you have your own problems and don't care about mine.

However, I know of one problem none of us at K-State will have to deal with this year.

The BCS.

The first poll of the year came out Monday. Needless to say, the 2-4 Cats are MIA. At first glance, this might be saddening to K-State fans, but I look at it in a different way. It's just one less thing for students to worry about.

Usually, when the first poll results are released, Cat fans go mad, upset with the team's ranking. Personally, I never got mad or ever will get mad about the BCS because I know it is a bunch of BS. I disregard all the rankings except for the final one of the season. It's the only one that matters.

For example, Oklahoma is No. 1, and Nebraska is No. 2. They play each other Saturday and probably will play again in the Big 12 Championship game. They will knock each other off.

What I am trying to say is, their positions right now in the BCS are meaningless (I like Oklahoma, plus four points).

I always have said the only way to be totally deserving of a National Championship birth is to win all your games. The only way a team has a legitimate complaint about being excluded from the title game is a team that is undefeated. As soon as a team with a loss makes it to the title game, all hell breaks loose on the college football front as it did last season.

Florida State got the bid to the title game despite losing to Miami, who lost to Washington, who lost to Oregon, who lost to Wisconsin and Oregon State, who both lost to a team of circus clowns and hoboes who lost to ... it goes on forever.

We don't have to worry this year, though. We aren't getting snubbed. No National Championship trophy for the Cats. Not even a Big 12 North title. They do have a legitimate shot at one piece of silverware, though.

That's the Governor's Cup, given to the winner of the K-State/KU showdown each year. The Jayhawks just got beat at home by Missouri, and they've been talking hoops in Lawrence for so long now that most students don't know football still is in season.

Coach Terry Allen possibly has been spending too much time tailgating outside Memorial Stadium since Kansas loosened its policy on alcohol on stadium property. A story in Tuesday's Daily Kansan (KU's student newspaper) is titled "Terry Allen has compared Mario Kinsey to former KSU

K-State looks for revenge in Texas Tech rematch

BY SEAN PURCELL

There seems to be a bitter taste still lingering in the mouths of K-State volleyball players.

The taste hasn't left them since Sept. 22 when the Cats lost a four-set battle with the Red Raiders in Lubbock, Texas.

Now, sophomore Lauren Goehring said, it's time for revenge.

"We believe we are a better team than they are," she said. "It will be an advantage getting them at our place."

The home atmosphere of Ahearn Field House has been something of which K-State (11-6, 7-4) has grown fond. The Cats are a combined 8-1 this year on their home turf and will be looking for a key win at home tonight to propel them into two difficult upcoming road contests.

"It is always a good break to play at home," Goehring said. "This will be a big match for us."

Tonight's match is the second in a grueling string of four matches in 10 days for the Cats. Texas Tech (12-7, 5-5) is the only home match of the four, with the next two matches on the road against Nebraska and Kansas.

On Monday, K-State lost a tight four-set match against nationally ranked Texas A&M. The match saw several lead changes and late rallies by both teams. In the end,

Rock Star

Play focuses on trials of fame

Willy Rivers, played by Vi Nahn H. Tran, blocks out his agent, Sult, played by Mary Katherine Housewirth. "Willy Rivers" is a play about a rock star who is trying to make a comeback after he has been shot. Throughout the play, Rivers visits friends from his past.

Told through the eyes and mind of a struggling rock star, "The Incredibly Famous Willy Rivers" tells the story of how he works through emotional problems to make a comeback after being shot during a performance.

Vi Nahn H. Tran plays Willy Rivers, and he said that this play has a bit of everything.

"It's a mixture of comedy and a really intense reality," said Tran, senior in theater and English. "All the actors bring honesty and sincerity to the characters."

Tran said he relates well to Willy Rivers because they seem to have a lot in common.

"Willy is involved with music and performance, and that is what I want to do," he said. "To present a character that is honest to reality," said Tran, senior in theater and English. "All the actors bring honesty and sincerity to the characters."

Willy, I had to keep my personal thoughts in check." Tran said he thinks the audience can identify with his character as well.

"In the end, this story is about how he is just like everyone else," he said. "The problems and the worries that plague Willy are the same all of us have. They are just aggravated by his position in society."

Director Rich Galvan, graduate student in theater, said he feels the audience will enjoy this play because of the setting and the message.

Galvan said the challenges of the play weren't with the cast but with what the cast works with.

"The script itself is very challenging," he said. "It doesn't take place in a chronological order and is very surrealistic. The script has dynamics to itself."

Another character in the play is Sult, Willy's manager. Mary Housewirth, who plays Sult, said she has had to focus on her character's personality.

"This has definitely been a challenge as an actress," Housewirth, graduate student in speech, said. "My character is like a devil on a shoulder."

"She keeps pushing Willy, and I am used to playing characters that are less aggressive."

Although the character is a change for Housewirth, she said she feels her acting ability has advanced.

"Personally, this show has helped me develop as an actress," she said. "I am trying a new method of acting, which will help with other roles."

Peter Burghart, freshman in musical theater, said he didn't mind playing a bad guy — as the man who shot at Willy Rivers — while he was onstage.

Burghart said the reason his character was after Willy was because the killer was in a state of envy.

"He did it out of jealousy," he said. "He had a yearning for something he never had."

Burghart said he felt he could play this role well

Sult, played by Mary Katherine Housewirth, discusses Willy's comeback in "Willy Rivers." The play will be performed in the Purple Masque Theatre.

because he really could feel like his character.

"We are both kind of outsiders," he said. "I was kind of an outsider for a long time. That's how the killer views himself."

With this play being more diverse than other plays, Galvan said, he hopes the audience leaves with a real understanding about the play itself.

"I want them to take away something from their life they have related to," he said. "I want everybody to know in a way we are all the same. We all struggle with life."

'Phantom' plays for Kansas City, Mo. audience

BY CORBIN H. CRABLE

Kansas State Collegian

As the lights go down, organ music blares throughout the theater. The haunting opening chords signal the beginning of the infamous tale of "The Phantom of the Opera."

The Andrew Lloyd Webber musical, based on the 1911 novel "Le Fantome de l'Opera" by Gaston Leroux, returned to the Music Hall in Kansas City, Mo., last week. The nearly sold-out show will run through Saturday, Nov. 10.

Kansas City, Mo.-based Theater League, which produces and presents shows in eight markets across the United States, is putting on the show.

The musical, which made its stage debut in 1986 in London, tells the story of Christine Daae, an opera singer who is haunted and intrigued by a mysterious figure who is captivated by the sound of her voice and falls in love with her. The phantom haunts the opera house and demands that the lead role in the next opera go to Christine.

Enraged, the opera house managers, along with Christine's love interest, Raoul, work to hunt down the ghost and bring order back to their opera house.

Somewhere along the way, Christine falls in love with the phantom and must make a choice to be with him or leave him forever.

Reida York, advertising and public relations manager for The Theater League, said the audience response for the Kansas City show has been tremendous.

"The show has been received phenomenally well, as it is in every market," York said. "The music is incredible. The sets and performers and the story itself are nothing short of a work of art. Everyone that has seen it has had wonderful things to say about it."

JJ Wickham, sophomore in theater, said she saw the production last week and said it was just as entertaining as the Broadway version.

"Everything was exactly the same," Wickham said. "I was absolutely excited. The colors of the costumes and the special effects are incredible."

Rebecca Pitcher, who plays Christine Daae, said she first was exposed to "The Phantom of the Opera" in 1989 when she listened to the music and read the book. She saw the production itself for the first time in 1992 and has been performing as Christine since 1997. Pitcher said she enjoys her character because of her many complexities.

"She falls in love with the phantom in more of a fatherly way," Pitcher said. "She's sort of confused about that. In the end, she realizes that even though he's a bit deranged, he means well."

Pitcher prepares for each performance by doing 10 to 15 minutes of vocal exercises before each show. She said that vocally, Christine, a soprano, is a challenging character.

"She varies from one extreme to the other," she said. "One minute, you're way up high (vocally), and the next, you're at the bottom of your range. It's very exciting doing these extremes from one minute to the next."

Besides being very involved in the show itself, York said, the cast is always ready to raise awareness of it for the public.

"The cast is very talented and cooperative and willing to go the extra mile to publicize the show," she said.

York said that earlier this week, the cast made an appearance at various haunted houses in the Kansas City metro area, such as Catacombs, to get the public in the mood for the show.

Pitcher said she enjoys this interaction with audience members and the public.

"I enjoy being a part of bringing something to people," Pitcher said. "We had a little girl who was terminally ill and came to see the show in Cincinnati. She had to use a respirator, but the day she saw us, she didn't have to use it."

"That's the reason we do this, to bring joy to so many people. To know we could bring that to her for one day is so touching and made it worthwhile."

Taliban possibly in hiding

BY ROBERT BURNS
The Associated Press

WASHINGTON, D.C.—Taliban forces in Afghanistan might be hiding in residential areas, aware of the U.S. military's hesitancy to bomb where civilians might be hit, a senior military officer said Tuesday.

Rear Adm. John Stufflebeem, deputy director of operations for the Joint Chiefs of Staff, said he has seen anecdotal evidence of such a Taliban tactic, which he attributed to their realization that troops in the field or at military installations are vulnerable to punishing attacks by American warplanes.

U.S. airstrikes continued Tuesday with about the intensity as the previous day, in which about 60 carrier-based strike aircraft, 10 long-range bombers and 10 land-based strike aircraft hit 11 planned target areas, officials said.

Air Force F-16G fighters entered the fray for the first time Monday, a senior defense official said, speaking on condition of anonymity. A pair of F-16Gs, equipped with advanced navigation and targeting systems that enable precision strikes at night, flew missions from bases in the Persian Gulf.

Stufflebeem said U.S. airstrikes have hit every known training camp of the al-Qaeda terrorist ring that is the ultimate target of allied military, financial and diplomatic pressure, and that bombing has eliminated most of the ruling Taliban regime's air defenses and communications. As a result, he said, the Taliban and al-Qaeda are dispersing what's left of their forces to save them.

He said he did not know how many al-Qaeda training camps had been hit, but British officials said Tuesday that nine had been destroyed.

"There aren't going to be any camps that we're going to allow them to use, and when we find them, we'll strike them," Stufflebeem said.

Stufflebeem also cast doubt on the possibility of ending the air campaign before winter.

"We don't think that's realistic," he said.

U.S. officials have said repeatedly through 17 days of bombing in Afghanistan that care is taken to avoid striking targets that might result in inadvertent civilian casualties. But Tuesday the Pentagon acknowledged two instances over the weekend in which errant bombs apparently hit civilian areas.

On Sunday morning Afghanistan time, a Navy F-14 Tomcat dropped two 500-pound bombs that mistakenly hit a residential area northwest of Kabul, the Afghan capital, Pentagon spokeswoman Victoria Clarke told a news conference. The intended targets were military vehicles parked about one-half mile away. She said she did not know how many people might have been hurt or killed.

The Taliban had said a strike Monday hit a Herat hospital and killed at least 100 people. U.N. spokeswoman Stephanie Bunker said it was not clear whether the military hospital was in use, and she had no information on casualties.

"As we always say, we regret any loss of civilian life," she said. "U.S. forces are intentionally striking only military and terrorist targets. We take great care in our targeting process to avoid civilian casualties."

The Pentagon also disclosed new details about a mishap during Saturday's commando raids into Afghanistan, in which an airfield was seized and documents taken from a Taliban compound that included a residence of Taliban leader Mullah Mohammed Omar.

An Army MH-47 special operations helicopter struck an unknown barrier while it was taking off from Afghanistan after the raid, shearing off its front landing gear, Clarke said. It continued the flight without incident and returned safely to an undisclosed base. No one aboard was injured, she said.

The chopper's wheels were displayed on television by the Taliban, which claimed to have shot down an American helicopter and foiled Saturday's raid.

MH-47 helicopters are flown by the Army's 160th Special Operations Aviation Regiment, which specializes in low-level night operations in support of Army Rangers and Special Forces soldiers.

which officials announced additional confirmed and suspected cases of inhalation anthrax, Congress returned to work, and the administration pledged a more aggressive testing and treatment program if additional tainted letters are discovered.

Before the current outbreak, "We had had no cases of inhalation anthrax in a mail sorting facility," said Jeffrey Koplan, head of the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention. "There was no reason to think this was a possibility."

For his part, Health and Human Services Secretary Tommy Thompson pushed Bayer Corp. to lower its price for Cipro, a front-line anti-anthrax drug.

Outside the White House, House Democratic Leader Dick Gephardt said weapons-grade material was responsible for spreading infections. And overseas, the State Department issued a worldwide alert warning U.S. citizens to be mindful of the risk of anthrax or other biological or chemical agents.

Six weeks after terrorists killed thousands in Washington and New York, administration officials drew a rhetorical connection to the outbreak of anthrax. The FBI released the text of three anthrax-tainted letters — each of them dated Sept. 11, the date that hijackers flew planes into the World Trade Center in New York and the Pentagon.

Bush believes the spread of anthrax "is another example of how this is a two-front war: that there are people who would seek to do evil to this country; that there are people who mean us harm," Fleischer said. "And they have mailed letters, obviously, to high impact places — the news media, to Majority Leader (Tom) Daschle, perhaps, in this case, to the White House."

The administration has been buffeted by criticism for waiting several days after the discovery of the letter addressed to Daschle before ordering testing at the central postal facility for the nation's capital. Without acknowledging any shortcomings, several officials pointed to changes in their outlook.

"We're going to err on the side of caution in making sure people are protected," Thompson said.

"When a case of anthrax does emerge, we will immediately move in at any and all postal facilities that might have handled that piece of mail," he said. He spoke as the U.S. Postal Service offered antibiotics as a precaution to 7,000 employees of six Manhattan post offices that may have been in the path of anthrax-contaminated letters.

Koplan, appearing before a separate panel, said, the public health system of the United States is severely challenged at this moment.

The latest evidence of that was in the Washington area and New Jersey, at postal facilities known to have processed one or more anthrax-tainted letters in the past few weeks. Both were closed after the presence of anthrax was detected.

LIBRARY

$10 per credit hour if it was a tuition fee.

He said it would take $4-5 million to get ARL accreditation. The increased tuition fee would generate that amount. He said the proposal might or might not be discussed.

"That would be recurring. It's not a one-time fee," Hobrock said. "That would continue until it's replaced by something else — and that's not likely."

To optimize the space and resources of the library, compact shelving has been installed in Hale 117. The compact shelving uses electricity to move sections of books.

"With compact shelving, each particular section of books has one row," said Kathryn Talbot, sorting supervisor and stacks manager.

"This optimizes space."

Talbot said compact shelving will help Hale grow. Some resources will not be moved to Hale's off-site location.

"We are constantly growing," she said. "We are trying to keep material in one location. We will evaluate how well the shelving is used in the library and go from there."

Hobrock said there is not a library today that will have everything. But the Hale staff will help students and faculty find the information needed.

"There is no reason to not get what you want if you come talk to us," he said.

"You won't find it by wandering in and looking around. Talk to our staff. We may not have it in a few minutes. It may take a few days. But it is not impossible to get what you want."

HALL

Hall, a Palomar Community College, Calif., transfer, played in the 1999 season but was suspended last season for academic reasons.

"He was willing to accept some very complex, difficult, hard consequences, and that gave him the opportunity to remain with the football team in a particular capacity," Snyder said. "He was not always going to be a guy who was on the field."

Hall has played in five games this season, rushing for 88 yards on 18 carries.

He was released on a $1,500 bond and is scheduled to appear in court Nov. 7. If he is found guilty, he could face 30 days in jail.

prodigy Michael Bishop."

Really.

The only comparison I see is that they are both quarterbacks. Hey, give me one of whatever Allen is drinking — make it a double. Put it on his tab, too.

Seriously, though, the Hawks aren't that good this year. On the other hand, we aren't, either. Give me a quarterback. I don't care which one, and tell him to give the ball to Josh Scobey and Rock Cartwright a combined 40 times. Maybe throw it once or twice and K-State will win that Cup this year.

Switching gears a bit, it's World Series time. I root for the Yankees. Yeah, I said it. They showed a lot of guts coming back from 2-0 against Oakland and then bouncing the supposed best team in baseball — Seattle — in five games. I have to get a prediction in before the series starts — I like the Yanks in six. More about the series next week.

VOLLEYBALL

however, the Aggies (15-3, 8-2) were too much for a K-State team that has struggled on the road.

A tight third set shifted the momentum in the match. After dropping the first set 28-30, K-State took game two 30-23. Just when the Aggies seemed to have game three, leading 28-25, the Cats surged back, fighting off six game-point opportunities. All the fighting was for nothing, however, as Texas A&M closed out the game 34-32.

K-State never responded after that.

"We need to learn to take care of the little things," senior Jayne Christen said. "We let them get on some runs and showed a lack of communication at times."

Texas A&M featured a trio of seniors who guided the Aggies to victory. Brandi Mouni led the way with 22 kills on .354 hitting, while fellow teammates Erin Lechler and Michelle Cole added 17 and 12 kills respectively.

Leading the way in a losing effort was senior Lisa Mimick, who turned in a career-best 22 kills. Mimick also added 18 digs as she and three other Wildcats posted double-doubles on the night.

Christen said it will be important for the Cats to work on playing their style of volleyball, while also keeping on their opponents' tendencies.

"We need to concentrate on playing our game," she said. "It is key to not let them dictate the match."

Worship service attendance sees increase

BY ALYSON RALETZ
Kansas State Collegian

Churches and worship services across Manhattan and campus received an increase in worshippers the week of the September attacks, but the mosque at the Manhattan Islamic Center experienced a temporary decrease in membership.

Prior to Sept. 11, an average of 570 people attended Grace Baptist Church services each Sunday, Pastor Bob Flack said.

On Sept. 16, the following Sunday, 693 people attended the services.

During the past four weeks, Flack said membership decreased. Compared to the previous average, however, about 70 more people are attending services.

He said the initial interest from people visiting the church ended quickly.

"The rash interest was not very long-lasting," he said. "The membership increase tailed-off, which will not remain. People will soon lose interest. It is all contingent on where events in America go."

Many people attended services soon after the attacks because church offers support in a time of crisis, he said.

"Going to church is a tangible way to express a deeper interest in things, like the tragedy," he said. "It gives people an occasion to realize there are more important things in life."

Since the attacks, smaller group Bible studies within the church have discussed the events, he said, while other church attendees are expressing concern.

"Overall, there is an increased awareness, but there has also been a greater sense of vulnerability at the church," he said.

Mohammad Al-Deeb, president of the Muslim Student Association, helps to lead services at the Manhattan Islamic Center. Unlike local churches, Al-Deeb said not as many people visited the mosque during the first five days after the attacks.

"In the beginning, numbers dropped," he said. "Muslims were afraid of backlash and retaliation."

Numbers quickly returned to normal once they realized their safety was not in jeopardy, he said.

"Manhattan turned out to be a nice place," he said. "There were no threats, and we felt we had the support of the community."

Membership did not increase like other religious organizations, he said, but more people than ever became interested in Islam and were contacting the center to get more information about the faith.

"In the past, we might have had three or four groups coming in trying to educate themselves about Islam," he said. "After Sept. 11, more and more student groups and individuals were visiting and calling the center."

"Islam was part of the national crisis. People wanted to know for themselves. They wanted to check it out and find out if what the media was saying was true."

Besides the many visitors to the mosque, he has been asked to lecture to many K-State and Manhattan elementary and high school classes.

This was a good thing, and it has cleared up many misconceptions about the faith, he said.

"This has not been a way to convert," he said. "It has been a very positive interaction and has allowed Muslims to be more aware and part of the community in Manhattan."

The attacks forever changed followers' lives, he said, because they had to start reexamining and protecting their own faith. He said that before the tragedy, many Muslims felt others understood Islam.

"The tragedy reminded Muslims that they had to talk about their religion to others," he

U.S. accuses Taliban of poisoning food suppliesBY ROBERT BURNS
The Associated Press

WASHINGTON, D.C. — A senior U.S. military officer expressed surprise Wednesday at the staying power of Afghanistan's Taliban, then accused the group of planning to poison humanitarian food supplies entering the country.

"They are proven to be tough warriors," said Rear Adm. John Stufflebeem, deputy director of operations for the Joint Chiefs of Staff. "I am a bit surprised at how doggedly they're hanging onto power."

On the 18th day of U.S. bombing, Stufflebeem gave no indication it would slacken soon. Secretary of State Colin Powell said he hoped the U.S. military effort in Afghanistan could be concluded before long, but he said it might extend into the Islamic holy month of Ramadan, which begins in mid-November.

U.S. warplanes kept up heavy day-and-night pounding on the outskirts of Kabul, the capital.

At a Pentagon news conference, Stufflebeem announced what he said was a warning to the people of Afghanistan that U.S. intelligence sources indicate the Taliban might poison relief supplies and blame it on the United States.

"We are confident in the information that we have that they may intend to poison one or more types of food sources and blame it on the Americans," Stufflebeem said. "We are releasing this information preemptively so that (Afghans) will know if the food comes from Americans, it will not be tainted."

Stufflebeem gave no specific information on how the alleged poisoning might be done.

In northern Afghanistan near the crossroads city of Mazar-e-Sharif, opposition forces Wednesday claimed to have killed 35

Students raise voices for Homecoming event

BY ADAM LEE

Kansas State Collegian

It was a noisy Wednesday night in Ahearn Field House as K-State students filled the stands for the 2001 All-University Homecoming Week's Pant the Chant competition.

In the event, residence halls and greek living organizations presented routines before a panel of judges. The skits contents included K-State-themed parodies of popular songs, clapping, stomping and participants positioning themselves in a group in the shape of a football.

The event had an atmosphere similar to a sporting event with the Classy Cats, K-State Cheerleaders and the Big Cats all in attendance and rousing the crowd. Even Willie the Wildcat showed up in a skit and dispersed a couple of tailgating Jayhawk fans. The K-State football captains spoke to the crowd in anticipation of Saturday's Homecoming game.

"I've been here four years, and I've never, ever lost to KU," K-State wide receiver Aaron Lockett said.

But the main focus of the night was the chant competition, where students took the floor for a minute and a half trying to make as much noise as possible.

Many of the greek groups and residence halls had been working on their presentations for the past couple of weeks.

"We put quite a bit of time into it. It was a lot of fun," said Megan Mayo, senior in human ecology and mass communications.

The results of the residence hall competition were Marlatt Hall, West Hall and Smurthwaite Hall in third place; Ford Hall, Haymaker Hall and Moore Hall in second place, and Strong Complex and Goodnow Hall in first place.

In the Greek Division: Kappa Delta, Farmhouse, Beta Sigma Phi and Phi Kappa Theta in fifth place; Alpha Xi Delta, Alpha Tau Omega and Phi Delta Theta in fourth place; Alpha Chi Omega, Delta Upsilon and Lambda Chi Alpha in third place; and Chi Omega, Sigma Nu and Delta Chi in second place. Kappa Alpha Theta, Beta Theta Phi and Theta Xi took first place.

The organizers of the competition emphasized that Pant the Chant and the rest of the Homecoming Week events are for the entire student body.

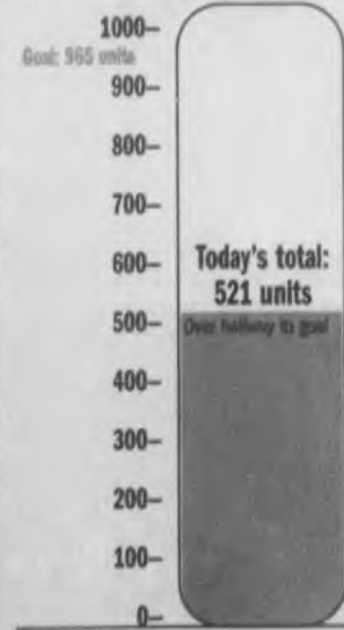

"A lot of people look at this as just a greek week, when it is not," said Lance Jones, senior in marketing and Homecoming coordinator. "I think it adds to student pride throughout the week."

Even though the event was a competition, many students put more emphasis on the student body coming together and showing pride in their school.

"It's a chance for everybody to get together and promote K-State. This is the most spirit I've seen all week," said Betsy Love, junior in accounting and finance.

Bomb threat temporarily closes local movie theater

Two bomb threats called into Seth Child Cinema Tuesday night forced moviegoers to evacuate the building twice.

At 10 p.m., the first threat was called in, and managers evacuated the building and searched the area with Riley County Police Department officers. When nothing was found, patrons were allowed back in and given the chance to refund their tickets.

The second call came just before 11 p.m. The theater shut down completely after the call, and no clues were found during the second search of the premises.

Management at the theater would not comment on the incident.

On Friday, a bomb threat was called into the Riley County Courthouse. The threat, which didn't lead to an evacuation, was the second threat within two weeks.

RCPD officials do not think the threats are related.

Men arrested on unrelated sex charges with minors

In unrelated cases, two men were arrested on sex charges Tuesday.

Both cases involved minors under the age of 15.

Rex Lowell Horn, 48, was arrested at 1:10 p.m. on a warrant for two counts of aggravated criminal sodomy and one count of aggravated solicitation of a child. Officials from the Riley County Police Department said the crime occurred Oct. 15.

Horn was released late Tuesday on a $10,000 bond.

Five hours after Horn's arrest, RCPD officers arrested James Michael Klonowski, 36, a resident of High Ridge, Mo. Klonowski, who was arrested on a Riley County warrant for one count of rape and one count of aggravated criminal sodomy, remains detained in the Riley County jail on a $25,000 bond.

The incidents, police officials say, occurred between 1995 and 1999.

Fundraiser pancake feed to finish habitat house

Habitat for Humanity will sponsor a fund-raiser pancake feed from 6 p.m. to 3 a.m. Saturday at Varney's Book Store in Aggieville.

The pancake feed will help pay for a house that was built at the corner of Yuma and Juliette streets and completed this summer. A family now lives in the house.

The cost will be about $4 for a plate, and it covers as many pancakes a person can eat. To pay for the house, $20,000 is still needed.

Sarah Albrecht, senior in anthropology, said the purpose of the pancake feed is to raise community awareness.

"Last year's pancake feed was successful, and it was a lot of fun to be down in Aggieville after the game," she said.

The house was completely sponsored by students.

"There was enough student involvement and enthusiasm for it, and it gave us a sense of accomplishment to do it by ourselves," Albrecht said.

Normally, houses are built through the Habitat for Humanity Manhattan chapter.

canceled manufacturing orders and rising layoffs since the terrorist attacks, the Federal Reserve said Wednesday.

The Fed's new survey of business conditions found that no area of the nation had been spared from the economic jolt caused by the attacks.

"The softness in consumer spending, manufacturing and construction activity is affecting the labor market, where layoffs and plant closings have been reported in many industries from financial services on the East Coast to media and advertising on the West Coast to auto parts in the central states," the Fed said.

The report, compiled from information gathered by the central bank's 12 regional banks, will be used by the Fed when it meets Nov. 6.

Most economists say the terrorist attacks have pushed the country into a recession and are predicting the central bank will cut rates for a 10th time at the November meeting.

House gives green light to bill authorizing searches

WASHINGTON, D.C. — The House gave overwhelming approval Wednesday to a compromise anti-terrorism bill giving police new power to secretly search the homes of terrorism suspects, tap all their phones and track their use of the Internet.

The bill passed 357-66. It was to be taken up by the Senate later in the day or Thursday with the idea of getting it to President Bush for a possible Friday signing at the White House.

"The House is taking a responsible step forward by giving law enforcement the tools necessary to secure the safety of Americans while protecting our constitutional rights," House Speaker Dennis Hastert, R-Ill., said after the vote.

Bush and Attorney General John Ashcroft have been calling for the legislation since the Sept. 11 attacks on the World Trade Center.

Civil liberty and privacy concerns by House and Senate members have delayed the legislation.

Cemetery sexton enjoys community relations

BY CORBIN H. CRABLE
Kansas State Collegian

Mike Mohler's job is anything but dead.

Since 1989, Mohler has worked as cemetery sexton and he oversees both Sunset and Sunrise cemeteries.

Mohler, who has worked for the city of Manhattan for 20 years, is in charge of the ground maintenance of the cemeteries, and he also purchases burial lots from the city, maintains burial records and organizes graveside services.

The city sexton works through the Manhattan Department of Parks and Recreation.

Mohler said in his job, dealing with people, such as the families of the deceased, is a must.

"You need to be a good listener and be aware of their needs," he said. "I enjoy the public relations, but it's also one of my biggest challenges in making everyone understand the rules and regulations."

Sometimes, Mohler said, not everyone adheres to those rules of the cemetery. Dealing with vandalism is a constant problem in his profession, he said, especially gravestones being tipped over.

"It's not a playground," he said.

"Monuments in the cemetery, if they get broken, it's hard to get them replaced. We fix them the best we can. We have to keep it (the cemetery) safe and sound."

Mohler said that while some people might find his job a bit unusual, dealing with dead bodies is only a small part of it. Most of his job involves maintenance of the cemetery grounds.

With the size of the cemeteries, Mohler said, maintenance during the fall and summer months can be a challenge.

"We're getting ready to rake the leaves," he said. "Usually, a substantial amount is removed, but that could take until the first of the year."

"In the summer, it takes a lot of time to mow the cemetery and weed-eat the gravestones."

In some cemeteries in Kansas, Mohler said, there is a shortage of lots, or areas of land in which bodies can be buried.

Sunset Cemetery opened in 1860 and is made up of 45 acres, and with the addition of the 80-acre Sunrise Cemetery in 1960, Mohler said Manhattan doesn't face that issue.

"We have the new cemetery, so shortage isn't a problem," Mohler said. "In other places, it's true."

Mohler said Sunset houses big names in the city like members of the Kimball and Wareham families. And, according to www.cemetery.com, Sunset also is the final resting place of Nehemiah Green (1837-90), who was a Union Army soldier during the Civil War. After the war, Green went on to serve as the Governor of Kansas from 1868-69.

Mohler said, however, that all those buried in the cemetery are important.

"Everyone we bury here is prominent to me," he said. "There's a lot of history here."

Officials urge safety in mail use

RANDOLPH E. SCHMID
The Associated Press

WASHINGTON, D.C. — Postmaster General John E. Potter said Wednesday he can't guarantee the safety of the mail, and he and other postal officials began suggesting Americans wash their hands after handling letters.

Improved safety gloves and masks are being sent to mail workers as the Postal Service awaits next week's delivery of its first high-technology equipment to sanitize mail.

Worries have mounted about mail safety because of anthrax cases in Florida, New York, Washington and New Jersey, at least some of them stemming from mailed items.

Deborah Willhite, a senior vice president of the Postal Service, said the agency is simply urging people to use common sense.

"We believe that people should wash their hands in soap and water after they handle their mail every day, just to make sure that if anything is on the envelope, that they're clean," she said.

Homecoming events chance to show spirit

This week, campus is a "Purple Paradise." For one week, Homecoming activities take over campus and provide students, faculty, alumni, staff and the city with a chance to celebrate the greatness of K-State.

In the past, Homecoming was an event that focused on greek organizations and the residence halls. For the last two years, the All University Homecoming Committee has worked hard to open up this process to the student body.

Activities like the Faculty Door Decoration Contest, Cats Carnival and the parade are inclusive of student organizations. These improvements have made Homecoming a more exciting, integrative week.

This week is about K-State; it is about bringing out our purple pride in this purple paradise. It is about showing spirit, and coming together to welcome those who once graced this campus and demonstrating how strong we are.

If you have never participated in Homecoming activities, take some time to figure out what it is all about. Go to the parade on Friday or wear purple today.

You are at K-State for a reason — this is the week to make that reason apparent to all. Let's take some time to remind ourselves and our alumni how great we are.

The Collegian's Campus Fourum is an anonymous call-in system that allows readers to voice their opinions on topics relevant to the publication.

Many that call into the Fourum must be majoring in ridicule. Apparently, that is all some of them know how to do.

For the lame idiot who doesn't know Bill Gramatica is Martin's brother, he is. Bill graduated from the University of South Florida in 2000 and was drafted by the Arizona Cardinals, and that is why they sometimes mention Bill as a place kicker for the Cardinals and Martin for the Buccaneers.

This is for mullet boy — why did you cut your mullet off? We all thought it was cool.

Hmm, was I wrong to think there was a men's rowing team at K-State? Gee, and I thought they did better than the girls' team in Boston. Maybe I am wrong.

Hey, did you hear about the men's rowing team? They got the 18th out of 75 in a harder category. There goes another club sport beating the socks off an NCAA team.

Marc Dunn, I know you are already married, but I still want to marry you. What do you say?

Fair weather fans' negative comments are no longer needed at the football games. If you think you can do better, tryouts are in the spring. Until then, please shut up.

If Randy Johnson doesn't win the World Series MVP, he is going to let down a lot of mullet fans around the world.

Can I please get some information about the Flickerstick concert on Nov. 3 at KSU Stadium?

To the three guys who helped me change my tire Friday afternoon on Bluemont, thank you.

Hey Joe, if you have money to buy a good baseball team, then anyone can make it to the World Series.

Oh where, oh where have my Wildcats gone? Oh where, oh where can they be? First, they won two games, and four have they lost. Oh where, oh where can they be?

Dear diary

www.opendiary.com

Web diary offers venue for sharing, reading 'personal' thoughts

You failed a test. Your best friend isn't speaking to you. You don't remember what you did last Thursday night, but for some reason, everyone else does.

All college students face stressors such as these throughout the semester.

You might have a friend to vent to, or a well-worn punching bag. If not, I offer another form of stress release: writing.

Surprising, coming from an English major, eh? But I offer not the antiquated method of notepad and pen. You can vent your frustrations electronically, on a Web site called The Open Diary.

The Open Diary offers a free service to diarists. Anyone is free to design and keep their own electronic diary, as well as view other diaries. You can opt to keep a private or public diary.

If you choose to create a public diary, you are offering your thoughts and emotions to all who care to read them.

Though most diaries are anonymous, a few daring people choose to use their real names as their Open Diary screen name.

For libel reasons (and sneaky exes,) I choose not to.

However, my diary is open to all who care to read it. There is a sense of community that comes with the public diary, a connection through anonymity that allows yourself and your reader to be completely honest about your feelings and daily concerns.

A bonus to keeping a public diary is that any who cares to read it can leave you notes.

At the bottom of each entry, there is a portion reserved for notes from your readers.

Most readers offer at least a kind word, if unable to dispense advice. When in need of an impartial sounding board, such notes can be very encouraging and helpful.

If you are too impatient for the Random method, there also are diary circles you may join. These circles are classified by age, interests and even vices.

There are diaries for college students, artists and calorie counters. If you are struggling with breaking a habit, such as smoking, you can start a Quit Smoking diary.

By doing so, you have hundreds of similar people at your disposal. You can ask other diarists questions about their struggles, if and how they overcame them.

Having a kindred soul just a mouse click away can do wonders for stress reduction.

The Open Diary allows its users to express themselves creatively. There are many colors and patterns you may choose from for your diary's background. If you are highly computer literate, you even could create your own design.

There always are poems to be read by anxious authors, or a story board idea that needs developing. If at a loss for a topic, you can write an entry on the Topic of the Week, and submit it for all to read.

By visiting www.opendiary.com, you can begin documenting your legacy for generations to come. Or at the very least, find a friend or two with the same provocations.

Computers, cell phones cause frustrations

Behold the power of the 21st century. Computers allow access to the world with the simple double-click of a contoured mouse. With cellular phones, we can call buddies en route. Stereos hold hundreds of CDs, playing each track in random order.

Some say we are blessed to have such opportunities under our fingertips in their slick black (and now fuchsia, turquoise or clear) casings.

To hell with them. Technology might have created many innovative ways to solve daily difficulties, but it presents problems we never would have had.

My desktop computer lets me check e-mail, write columns, compile CDs and print out beautiful color copies — all in my underwear, without fear of arrest. Yet, the stupid thing creates hassles I never could have conceived at the time of purchase.

Earlier this week I was on the phone for over four hours while different so-called gurus tried to figure out why my Internet connection was on the fritz. I lost time and a whole lot of self-esteem in the process.

A black cloud hung over my head from the moment I discovered I could not rendezvous with my favorite faceless friend, the Net.

Who would have thought not having online access would ruin entire weeks? What was all the fuss? That I could not check the temperature at weather.com in the morning instead of peeking my tousled red bedhead out the door?

Innovations like the Internet would not seem so essential if we took more control over their role in our lives. PCs have many useful functions.

Yet, getting caught up in downloading wallpaper of Abercrombie & Fitch models, chatting on AOL Instant Messenger and sending those ridiculous friendship chain letters somehow misses the point.

Computers and cellular phones were meant to be shortcuts and conveniences, not essentials. We cannot always expect them to function perfectly.

They can be gone in one fateful flash of lightning or at the whisk of a pesky pickpocket.

Our dependence on the mechanized wirings of differing devices raises an important question: Who is really in control? Is it people like myself who just learned how to set their cell phone alarms?

My encounters with the computer people who get paid to help me run simple communications tests tell me no. Most people are just like myself and, despite their best efforts, will never know enough about their devices.

The fast pace with which we adopt technology does not give us enough time to learn every obscure detail. Computers have become so commonplace that even Granny Smith has her own apple. Yet, so many Americans really do not understand how their PCs operate.

There is not enough time to study up on every aspect of each mechanical device in a household. Inevitably, we will get frazzled and confused.

Obviously, our mechanized counterparts have their shortcomings. Be wary. Technology is our friend, but only in fair weather — literally. One storm, and it is out of commission.

A solution is remembering that more is not always better. Too often, extras are equated with good living. Remember how everyone used to roll their car windows up manually?

I miss those days, because my window motor dies every three months.

Technology has its place, but it shouldn't be put on a pedestal.

The next time your cell phone cuts out, recall that a few years ago, out-of-home phone use actually required a quarter and knowledge of the phone number.

Still, I cannot stop anxiously awaiting the speedy recovery of my computer. I really miss my weather reports.

Mother of ex-football player urges screening involvement

Editor,

My name is Sharon Bates, and I am Anthony Bates' mother.

On July 31, 2000, Anthony was 20 years old and an up-and-coming football player at K-State. Anthony died tragically and suddenly from a heart condition called HCM, Hypertrophic Cardiomyopathy.

Sometimes this disease is referred to as Enlarged Heart or Athletes Heart. In Anthony's case, and sadly in others, this disease was not discovered until after his death.

We had no idea Anthony's heart was diseased, and we had no warning signs of his condition.

The only sure way to detect HCM is to have an echocardiogram. An echocardiogram is a painless procedure that takes a sonogram or picture of your heart through your chest wall. Then the cardiologist can determine if the patient's heart has any abnormal sized walls, which would cause blood flow obstruction. This procedure just takes a few minutes.

Prior to the new technologies available, the cost of an echocardiogram could range from $800 to $1,600. Exactly why insurance companies have not taken a proactive stance on cardiac screening for all young athletes. Now with these new technologies and portable echocardiogram machines, we can test a whole football team in a matter of hours for less than the cost of one test.

The Anthony Bates "91" Memorial Heart Screening event is to honor the memory of Anthony and give back to the community of Manhattan that has helped our family through our journey of grief.

I want to invite the K-State community to come to our first Free Cardiac Screening event. From 2 to 7 p.m. Monday, we will be giving free echocardiograms to anyone and everyone over the age of 13. The event will be in the K-State Student Union in the K-S-U ballrooms.

I would like to thank all the volunteers and businesses that are making this a successful event. Plus, I would like to take this opportunity to publicly thank Coach Bill Snyder, his coaching staff and the K-State football team for your support and love.

We do not walk alone! Each of us can make a difference in the success of our lives and the lives of others. Thank you with all my heart! God Bless America.

In the dark

Conman Mike Talman, played by Steve Chellew, tries to convince Suzy Hendrix, played by Sarah Bode, to tell him where a doll is. It was unknowingly smuggled into the country by her husband. Three men are now trying to con her into telling them where the doll is because it contains drugs.

Elements of intensity add excitement to play

BY SARAH RICE
Kansas State Collegian

Sex, drugs and violence fuel a thrilling story that unfolds in the play, "Wait Until Dark."

Director Jason Chanos described the show as suspenseful and complicated.

"It's a classic thriller loaded with lots of suspicious and intense moments with characters," he said. "As far as witches and goblins go - no. It's a realistic scary tale."

The play is about a doll somewhere in an apartment that the apartment owner, Sam Hendrix, doesn't realize is significant, Chanos said. The doll was smuggled into the country inadvertently by Sam. Three men are coming to get the heroin that is inside. The men attempt to trick Sam's wife, Suzy, who is blind, into giving them the doll.

"There is a spectacular scene where (Suzy Hendrix) turns out all the lights," he said. "They have to come down to her level."

The actors have been practicing for only three weeks due to casting problems. However, Chanos said, the cast is easy to work with.

"It has been challenging, but the end justifies the means," Chanos said. "I am really pleased with the cast. They have worked hard."

Sarah Bode, sophomore in theater, who plays Suzy Hendrix, said it hasn't been too difficult to play a blind character.

"Last year I was Helen Keller, so I was already prepared," she said. "Also, Jason blindfolded me for some of the rehearsals."

Adam Martin, senior in wildlife biology, who plays Sergeant Carlino, described his character as muscle-bound and not too terribly quick. He said that three weeks of rehearsals was barely enough time to be ready.

"It was hard getting used to everything," he said. "This is my first play. I had a lot to take in all at once."

In addition to the challenging characters, technical aspects have proven to be just as challenging.

"It is a heavy props show," Chanos said. "It was a challenge to find all the knickknacks."

Bode said that another challenge is the lighting.

"It is a challenge to have lighting cues when there is no light on stage," she said.

Mike Eaton, senior in theater, who plays Harry Roat Jr. and Sr. encouraged students to attend the show at least once.

Gloria, played by Jessica Furney, argues with Suzy Hendrix, who is blind, played by Sarah Bode, in the Columbian's production of "Wait Until Dark." Gloria is a young girl who assists Suzy with daily tasks while her husband is out of town.

Show Information

"Wait Until Dark" will show at the Columbian Theatre in Wamego Oct. 26-28 and Nov. 2-4 with Friday and Saturday shows starting at 7:30 p.m. and Sunday shows at 2 p.m. Tickets are $15 for adults and $8 for children and are available at the Columbian box office, (800) 899-1893.

Cats avenge earlier loss to Texas Tech

BY DAN SMITH
Kansas State Collegian

When the K-State volleyball team left Lubbock, Texas, on Sept. 22, after losing in four games to Texas Tech, the team made a pact not to forget the defeat.

"We struggled at Tech the last few years, and we really wanted it this year down there, and it really got under our skin that we couldn't get it done," senior outside hitter Liz Wegner said.

"We knew that when they came up here that we were just going to crush them."

Mission accomplished.

Against the Red Raiders, something other than the standard-issue competitive desire was burning inside the Cats — something that turned into a 3-1 victory.

Jumping out to a quick 8-0 advantage in the first set, Wegner said the team's hunger for revenge was obvious from the first serve.

"It was definitely payback," she said, "and I think we came out on fire and it definitely showed."

K-State used that emotion to extend the lead to as many as 10 points twice in the set and scored the final two points to take the first game convincingly, 30-19.

Wegner registered eight kills in the first set.

"I got the sense that our team came ready to play," head coach Suzie Fritz said.

"I did feel that they were very well prepared to play. I felt like they were emotionally, mentally, physically into the match, but it's never going to be a short night with Texas Tech. They're a very nice volleyball team, and they're going to put pressure on you."

That pressure started to come in game two. The Cats fought tooth and nail with the Raiders for much of the second set and got its first lead at 17-16, only after Tech's Melissa McGehee's hit sailed out of bounds.

K-State would use a 6-0 run later in the game to stretch the lead to 25-18 and cruised the rest of the way to a 30-22 win.

But the Cats' biggest test still was to come, senior outside hitter Lisa Mimick said.

"We've been working on coming out between sets two and three and really starting off quick in set three," she said.

K-State couldn't find the mark early in game three, allowing Tech to put together several big runs and a strong comeback effort.

"It seemed like we gave up a little bit and we just let them get on a few runs," Mimick said. "We try to put an emphasis on siding out the very first ball, and in game three, we didn't do that."

"We gave them two, three and four points in a row, and we really need to fix that. Once we give them one, we can't give them any more."

Tech took the game 30-18 behind a solid defensive effort. But more than Tech playing better in the third set, Wegner said, it was errors of a different kind that plagued the Cats in game three.

"It was just a matter of us beating ourselves," she said. "We made the errors, we hit the balls out of bounds, we served the ball into the net, we made the little errors that gave them the momentum and they won the game."

"They didn't beat us. It was our fault, and we just had to come together and take care of the little things," she said.

Still, Fritz said the team never panicked and managed to salvage some momentum from the loss.

"I didn't feel the momentum was slipping away," she said. "I knew that if we just got back on track that we'd be right back into the match."

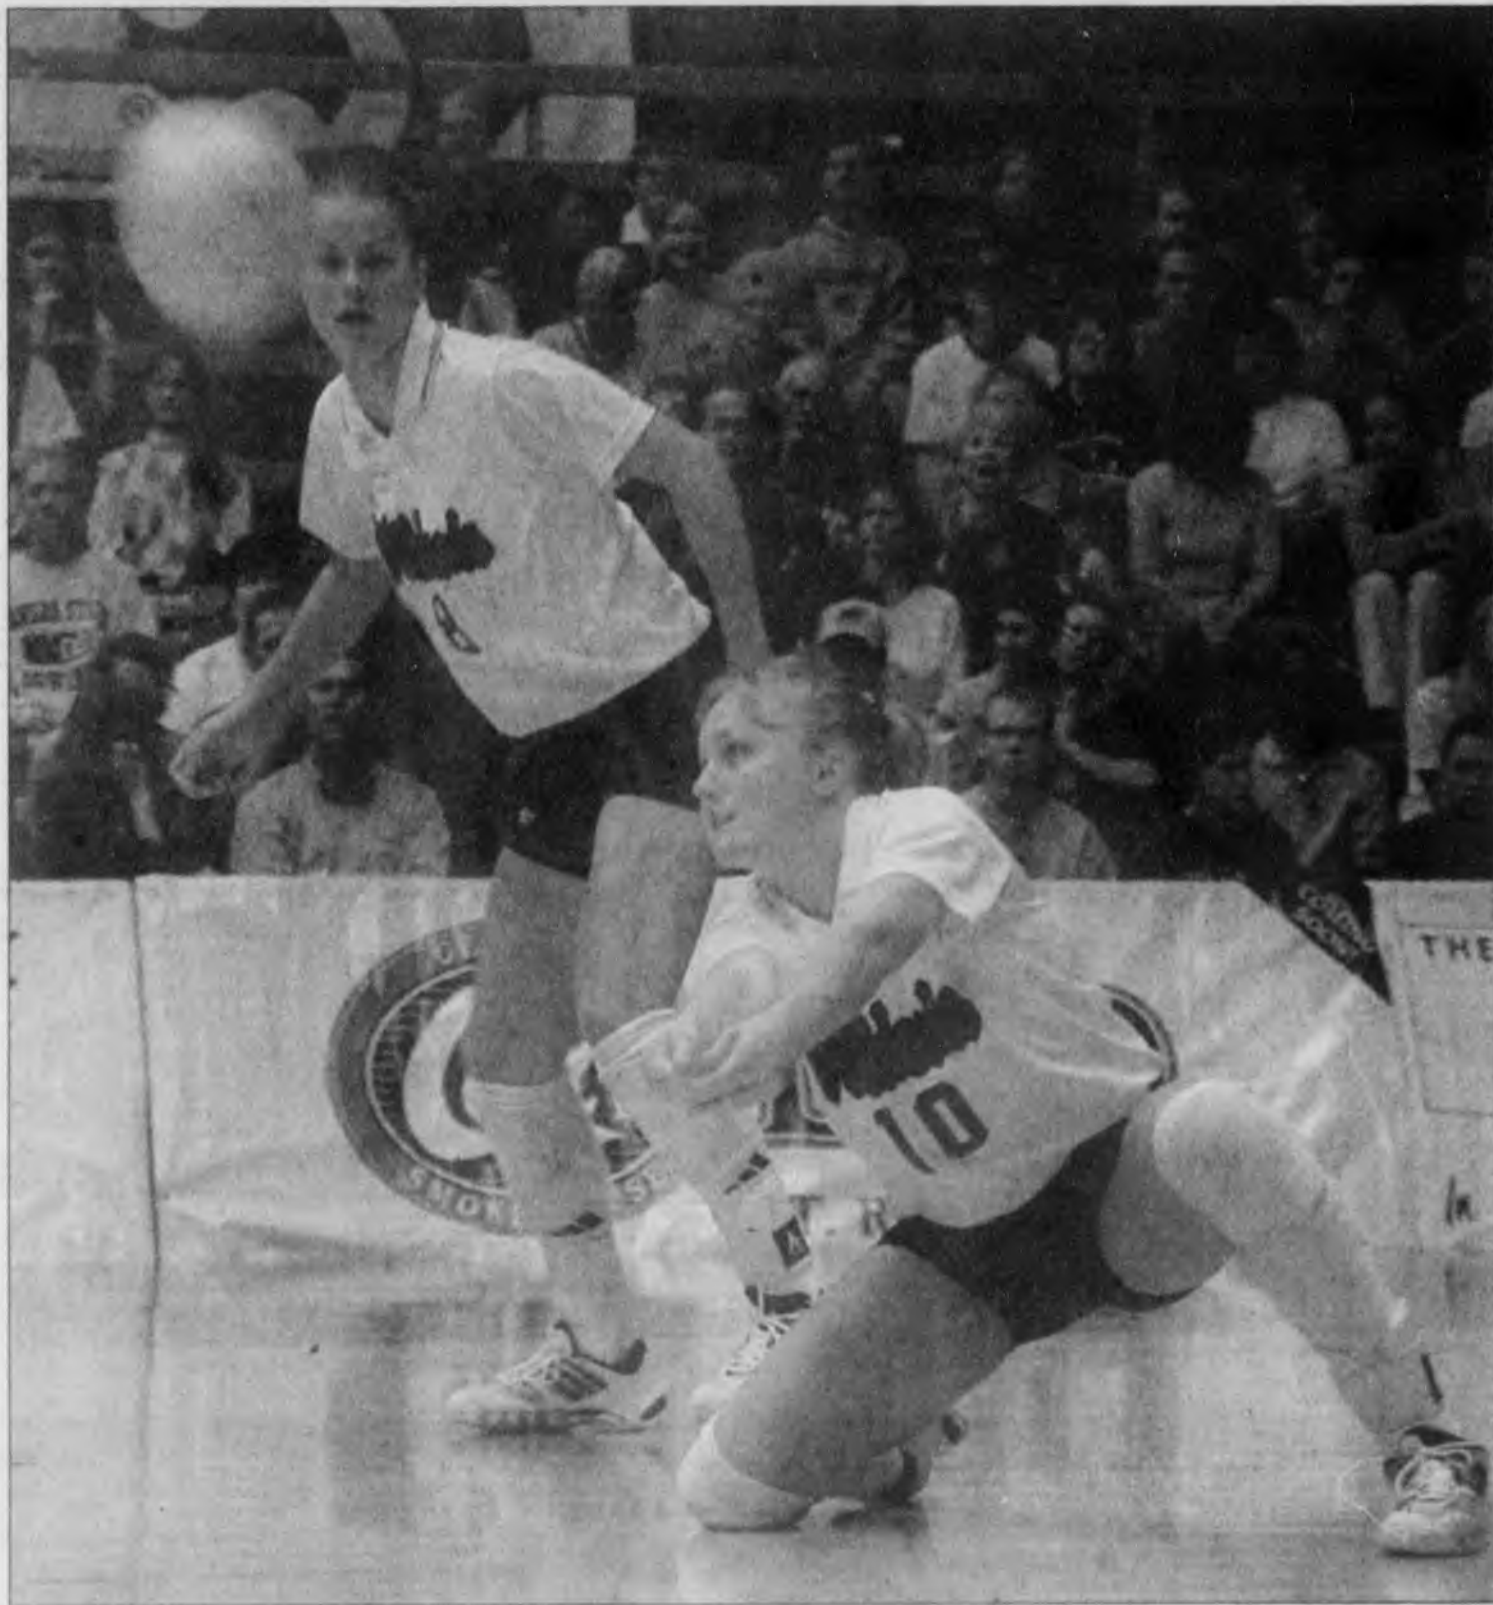

And get back on track they did.

Despite another close game in the fourth set, K-State used 17 kills, including four from Mimick, to overcome several deficits and finish off the Raiders with a 4-0 run in the final stretch.

"This team is very good," Fritz said.

"They believe in each other, and they believe in each other's ability, so being down three or four or five points doesn't really concern us as maybe sometimes it should because we know that we have the ability and the character to come back in a match like that."

"I like our chances when it's tight because I know that we compete very hard."

Sophomore setter Kris Jensen returns a shot against Texas Tech on Wednesday night at Ahearn Field House. The Wildcats defeated the Red Raiders three games to one, increasing their winning streak at home.

K-State's defense limits Tech's hitting ability

BY LAURA BOYD

Kansas State Collegian

Drew Rose/Collegian

Freshman setter Gabby Guerre and senior middle blocker Jayne Christen attempt to block a shot during the Wildcats win over Texas Tech on Wednesday night at Ahearn Field House.

K-State proved to Texas Tech on Wednesday night that if you can't hit, you can't win.

Holding Tech to hitting percentages under 15 percent in three out of their four games, K-State was able to dominate on the court and, in return, get the points. Taking over in game two, K-State finished the game, hitting almost 45 percent.

"It's been our philosophy all year long that we want to improve every day, we want to improve with every point, every game, every match, just every time because there are just very few opportunities," Coach Suzie Fritz said.

That is just what K-State did.

Coming into Wednesday night's match ranked sixth in hitting in the Big 12 and sitting at just over 22 percent, K-State saw Tech as a great opportunity to its numbers.

"I thought we served extremely, extremely well, maybe the best that we served all year, so we disrupted their quick series, which they like to do, and it became kind of a left side battle a little bit, and we like our chances in that game," Fritz said.

The Cats' determination was a key factor in the transition between games. Noticing their mistakes and making the proper adjustments allowed

K-State to come out strong in game four.

"We got a little different matchup in game three, so we were looking at a different hitter than we did in the first two games," Fritz said. "That changes things a little bit, and I don't think we made good adjustments to that situation."

The Cats weren't just showing skill at the net. With 76 digs, K-State was able to keep the ball in play and prevent the Red Raiders from scoring. Lisa Mimick, a key part of that equation with 24 digs, said she is proud of her passing and thinks her hard work in practice is really showing.

"I was just playing my middle back defense. I kind of take pride in that. That's one thing I can kind of do, so I try to take pride in that, and we do a little defense here and there in practice and shoot. I go against our hitters every day to dig, so I get pretty good practice that way," Mimick said.

K-State's ability to keep the ball in play led to a intense game four that brought out a new energy in fans and players alike. The Cats finished the game strong with kills by Mimick and Liz Wegner and two aces by Lauren Goehring, allowing them to clench an emotional victory over Texas Tech.

"We took them out of their game and then we were able to block some balls. They were giving us free balls and we were just able to roll. That was really a key factor," Wegner said.

Wildcats to break losing streak in weekend's Sunflower Showdown

Unlike my sad, disgruntled fellow sports writers, I am going to take a different approach to the football game this Homecoming weekend.

Sure, I am a little nervous and anxious about the game.

Sure, my roommates sold their tickets yesterday in efforts to elaborate their tailgate party.

Sure, the Jayhawks have two more conference wins.

But when it comes down to it, K-State just has the better football team.

We shouldn't give up on the Wildcats. K-State still can come away from this season with a winning record. Weirder things have happened, like ... well, like K-State being 0-4 in the Big 12.

Just like every other winning program in the country, it was inevitable that the Cats would go through a slump sometime. Things just aren't falling for K-State.

Yes, it sucks.

And yes, no one thought the streak would last this long. But K-State still is a good team. The Cats only lost to Oklahoma, the No. 2 ranked team in the country, by a point (And if we would have only made one of those extra point attempts — actually, I don't want to my view

Erika Sauerwein

get started). If you take away three mistakes (OK, disastrous errors) against the Aggies, K-State, for the most part, dominated the game against a very good

A&M team.

The Wildcats had 24 first downs to the Aggies' 9. If you take away the three minutes A&M scored 17 points, K-State most likely would have most posted its first win in conference play in its first try.

I can't really tell you what happened against Colorado. Maybe you can ask the psychic Derek Boss who claims to stand up to Ms. Cleo and who claimed, I might add, that the Cats would win the last three games.

Changes were made in the A&M game that needed to be, well, "Dunn" (to play on words). Quarterback Marc Dunn has proved that he can and deserves to start in Saturday's game. With his passing abilities, he easily could tear up KU's secondary. The junior transfer hasn't had enough playing time to show what he is capable of.

Wildcat fans saw a glimpse of his talent when he marched K-State down the field twice and gave the Cats a chance at a comeback against the Aggies. In the fourth quarter alone, Dunn passed for 69 yards on 8 of 11 attempts, and he rushed for a touchdown.

OK, so he didn't have a good game at Tech. But look at the circumstances he was given. It was his first career start, on the road and in a must-win game situation for the Wildcats. That's not an easy transition for anyone.

Dunn hasn't had the time to get uncomfortable or confident. Eli Roberson had the UCLA and New Mexico State game to boost his esteem and numbers. Dunn was watching from the sidelines. Saturday could be the breakthrough game for the junior.

I also would stick with Joe Rheem as K-State's kicker. Forget the redshirt thing. The freshman proved last week that he can kick an extra point with grace, a feat which all of a sudden has become quite the honorable act for the Wildcats.

The Cats will win this Saturday. They have no choice. I am not giving them the choice.

We all know this face-off goes beyond just a game, and I don't have to elaborate why. It's KU. It's Homecoming. And basketball season is coming up. K-State has to win.

said. "They started to think, educate themselves more if they needed to, and talked to friends and neighbors about their faith. It reminded them about their responsibility to Islam."

Bob Anderson, Christian Challenge director, said there were more students at its Thursday worship after the attack, but its membership has returned to its steady 400 to 500 students.

"We've given time in our worship and prayed for victims," Anderson said. "The Thursday after the attack, we spoke about processing what was going on in our own lives."

Students often attend organizations' meetings like Christian Challenge during hard times, he said, because they do not know what else to do and are questioning their faith and the world around them.

"This tragedy has brought us back to the living hope we have," he said. "Ultimately, our hope has to be in God and a close relationship with him."

"We hope, by coming to the meetings, we are giving them a solid sitting. At home, they are bombarded with CNN and graphic pictures. I think by attending, they gain a greater confidence in the Lord. It helps to strengthen us to walk through life."

here always seem to be doing something."

She was only planning on studying at K-State one semester, but because of her positive experiences, she said she has decided to stay until May. When she returns to Netherlands, she will have one more semester at Utrecht.

"I don't want to graduate yet," she said. "Staying here helps me to push it forward as much as possible. Also, I like it here so much. I miss my family, but I can't think of anything I don't like here."

Taliban troops and captured 140 others. They claimed that about 20 U.S. troops were in the area directing U.S. air strikes in support of the opposition forces.

Asked whether opposition forces fighting the Taliban in that area were providing targeting information to U.S. officials, Stufflebeem said, "We are helping him and his troops and he is helping us in our effort."

Stufflebeem said the U.S. government would use all possible means of alerting Afghans to the possibility of poisoned food supplies, apparently including leaflet drops and airborne radio broadcasts.

He provided no specifics on the kinds of food supplies that might be affected, although he noted that the Taliban are reported to have taken over some Red Cross warehouses and might be collecting food ration packages dropped by the hundreds of thousands into Afghanistan by U.S. cargo planes in recent weeks.

That the Pentagon would raise such an issue underscores the unusual nature of this conflict, which was set in motion by the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks on the United States.

U.S. officials have said from the start that this anti-terror campaign would be fought on many fronts — military, diplomatic, financial and law enforcement. It also is becoming a battle for world opinion — especially the Muslim world — as the Taliban attempt to highlight civilian casualties caused by U.S. bombing mistakes.

In an attempt to counter the bad publicity over civilian casualties, the Pentagon on Wednesday provided a briefing for reporters on techniques used by the Taliban to fight the propaganda war. The briefer, who spoke under ground rules which did not permit use of his name or job title, offered examples.

He cited an Oct. 8 U.S. aerial attack on military vehicles and radar at a Taliban base near the western city of Herat. A U.S. aerial photograph of the base, displayed at the Pentagon briefing, showed what the briefer identified as a Taliban helicopter parked just yards from the base's mosque.

The briefer said that because a helicopter normally would be parked on the base's airfield, its placement next to the mosque indicated the Taliban had one of two intentions: either that it would be bombed, causing collateral damage to the mosque and offering fuel for moral outrage against the United States, or that U.S. pilots would spare the helicopter because of its proximity to the mosque. As it turned out, the helicopter was bombed and the mosque escaped unharmed, the briefer said.

Stufflebeem, meanwhile, disclosed that a U.S. Army Black Hawk helicopter that crashed in Pakistan on Saturday was retrieved Wednesday by two Marine Corps CH-53 Sea Stallion helicopters.

The Marine Corps choppers made an initial recovery attempt Saturday, but aborted their mission after drawing fire from unknown assailants.

Stufflebeem said Pakistani authorities secured the area so that the Marines could go back in safely. No one was injured in the aborted attempt, U.S. officials said.

Everything will be clear tomorrow.

Some of our patients go to bed at night knowing the next day will be clear and bright, thanks to a procedure called Corneal Molding. They simply put in special contact lenses before going to bed... and wake up to clear vision that lasts all day. Its non-invasive and about half the cost of lasik.

Investigations prove substances not hazardous

BY NANCY HULL

Kansas State Collegian

A white, powdery substance found early Thursday morning in Seaton Hall turned out to be nothing but chalk dust.

The morninglong anthrax investigation by campus safety officials concluded when students revealed the suspicious substance on the second-floor hallway resulted from an innocent game.

Steven Galitzer, director of public safety, said students were playing with a ball that was rolled up in a rag, and it left chalk dust marks on the floor.

"It was unintentional," Galitzer said.

"They didn't realize it would be understood as a threat."

Employees discovered the powder just before 8 a.m. Thursday in about a dozen locations outside architecture offices and classrooms.

Specially trained employees wearing protective clothing handled the cleanup. Two staircases and the entire second floor were closed during the morning.

This was the second anthrax scare on campus in one week. A suspicious substance was found near faculty mailboxes in Throckmorton Hall, and tests this week confirm it was not a hazardous bacteria.

Campus officials will continue to respond seriously to suspicious reports, Galitzer said.

"Back in August, no one would have paid attention to these things. Today, if someone spills something, it needs to be cleaned up so it's not misunderstood by the next person that walks by," he said.

Galitzer said people should be more concerned with how their actions might be interpreted.

"There's a heightened sense of fear of the unknown," he said. "People are afraid of many things."

Capt. Robert Mellgren with the K-State Police said if the chalk dust would have been a prank, they would prosecute those responsible to the full extent of the law.

"With the way it is right now, everyone is taking precautionary measures," Mellgren said. "We're taking everything seriously."

U.S. vows to employ full wrath

BY KAREN GULLO

The Associated Press

WASHINGTON, D.C. — Attorney General John Ashcroft pledged Thursday to use new powers granted by Congress to pursue terrorist suspects relentlessly, intercept their phone calls, read their unopened e-mail and phone messages and throw them in jail for the smallest of crimes.

Echoing a threat then-Attorney General Robert Kennedy made four decades ago to pursue mobsters for spitting on the sidewalk, Ashcroft said: "Let the terrorists among us be warned."

"If you overstay your visas even by one day, we will arrest you. If you violate a local law, we will hope that you will and work to make sure that you are put in jail and be kept in custody as long as possible," he said in a speech to the nation's mayors.

Justice officials said they intend to use the new surveillance and wiretap powers granted by Congress on Thursday to build cases against many suspected terrorists already in custody on immigration issues or technicalities. President Bush has promised to sign the bill quickly into law.

Tuition hike possible for next 5 years

BY ALYSON RALETZ

Kansas State Collegian

K-State students could expect to pay up to triple in tuition in the next five years, Student Body President Kyle Barker said.

"It's not a question of if they will increase," Barker said. "It's a question of how much."

He said the Kansas Board of Regents, for the next five years, will transfer tuition ownership from the board to its universities. K-State administrators have created and are reviewing five possibilities for future tuition, he said, all of which include an increase.

One option would be to increase tuition 10 percent every year for five years, while a second possibility is to increase tuition about 25 percent every year.

Instead of an overall tuition increase,

Community gathers to celebrate Homecoming, spread school spirit at Cats Carnival

Moonwalking, bungee running, cotton-candy eating, football tossing and cookie munching amplified Homecoming spirit Thursday.

Students and K-State community members attended and played at the second-annual Cats Carnival in the Waters quad.

"We're trying to promote Homecoming throughout," said Erica Titus, Homecoming Student Committee chair. "People in the community as well as students can participate. We're saying, 'Support Homecoming — it's fun for everybody.'"

The Homecoming Student Committee and the KSU Alumni Association put on the event, which was very successful, Titus said.

People raced against one another on an inflatable bungee run. They tried to run as far as they could before a bungee chord

Brian Macek, fourth-year student in architecture, said he enjoyed this event as a stress reliever with some of his studio buddies.

"We've all been competing to see who can run the farthest — just relaxing from studio," he said. "We're just kind of goofing off — we don't get to very much."

Macek said the carnival helped him and Dillons station, tragedy cause gas price decrease

BY SARAH BAHARI

Kansas State Collegian

Gas prices in Manhattan and the rest of the state have hit record lows for this year.

On Wednesday, the state average was $1.18 — down by 43 cents from a month ago and 31 cents from a year ago. It's the lowest Kansas has seen this year.

In Manhattan, prices ranged from $1.07 and up.

They should remain fairly constant, according to the American Automobile Association of Kansas.

Service stations in Manhattan attributed the low prices to several reasons. At the top of the list was the new Dillons gas station.

Some local businesses are concerned that the addition could drive them out of business.

"They're cutting down the market," said Steven Stewart, assistant manager of Dara's Fast Lane. "They're forcing a lot of local businesses to cut down. But, people here are going to continue to support local businesses."

The Kwik Shop, which is owned by the same company as Dillons, has recently lowered its prices, Patrick Crough, clerk, said.

"We match our competition around town," he said.

Following a national trend, the Dillons near Fort Riley Boulevard opened its gas station Oct. 2. The Manhattan store was the 11th Dillons to have gas on-site.

Dillons spokesman Dennis Gaschler said customer response has been positive.

"It's gone very well," he said. "We're pleased with the traffic we've had."

But for Dick Simmons, manager of Ampride, the new addition meant decreased sales. Simmons said since Dillons opened, the store has sold a couple 100 gallons of gas less each day.

"I can't say that that's exactly why, but it has been less since they've opened," he said.

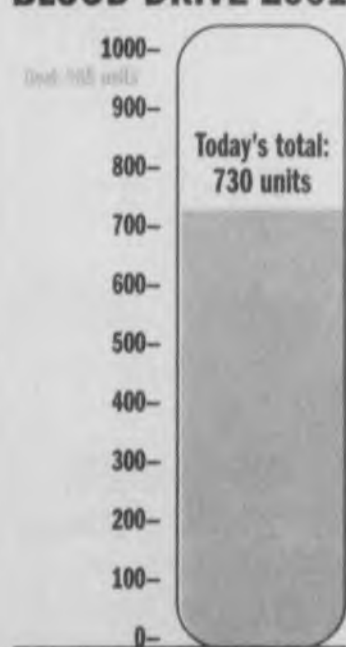

Simmons said although his customers have continued their support, a national chain can put smaller shops out of business. The smaller stations cannot always afford to match discounted prices.

"It can, yes, and unfortunately, when this happens, you start losing the small neighborhood businesses," he said.

Now, 27 percent of all fuel is sold at a grocery store or high-volume

Gas prices in the Manhattan area, including these in Wamego, have dropped more than a half-dollar in the past weeks. The current prices are lower than the statewide average and are the lowest they've been all year.

Salina campus sponsoring Halloween Haunted Hike

K-State Salina's College of Technology and Aviation's annual Haunted Hike will be from 9 p.m. to 12 a.m. tonight at Indian Rock Park in Salina.

The event will continue Saturday, Sunday and Tuesday. The college's Student Government Association and the United Way is running the event.

"This year's hike is expected to increase on last year's numbers," said Brandon Vavra, student activities chair and sophomore in airway science. "Indian Rock is the right place to hold this type of event, and it definitely will be scary for the weak of heart."

For approximately two to three weeks Vavra, Student Senate chair Matt Diederich, and a number of others have been working on the four-day event.

"This year's quality looks to surpass the original with greater scares and an enhanced atmosphere and scenery," Diederich said.

The Haunted Hike revolves around a legend surrounding the apparent deaths of three high school students in Haunted Woods in 1975. One student supposedly lived to tell her story.

KU researchers receive grant to help area children

LAWRENCE — University of Kansas education researchers received a $6.24 million grant to help youngsters in eight Kansas City, Kan. schools.

The U.S. Department of Education awarded the five-year grant to the Juniper Gardens Children's Project, which is affiliated with the Schiefelbusch Institute for Life Studies at the University of Kansas.

The grant will be used to establish a center that will train educators to work with about 2,500 students.

Participating schools will focus on using techniques that research has proven effective. The schools also will be asked to establish discipline programs that emphasize rewarding appropriate behavior and preventing situations leading to behavior problems.

Man walks 150 feet to help after being struck by train

LANCASTER, Kan. — A Mayetta man walking on railroad tracks was hit from behind by a train moving at nearly 50 mph, but he was able to get up and walk to help, officials said.

Wednesday's collision knocked Solon Jessepe, 20, into the gravel near the track that runs parallel to U.S. Highway 73. After he was smacked off the tracks by a Union Pacific train, he got up and walked about 150 feet to the highway, where construction workers saw him and stopped to help, said Larry Myer, an investigator with the Atchison Sheriff's Department.

Jessepe was walking in the direction of Huron, where he sometimes lived. He told rescue workers he didn't see or hear the train coming, even though the train's engineer reported sounding the whistle for about a quarter-mile ahead of the man.

Jessepe was taken to an Atchison hospital, where he was in stable condition Thursday.

Judge to monitor FBI's e-mail tracking system

WASHINGTON, D.C. — Civil liberties groups got a victory with a provision in anti-terror legislation that would require a judge to monitor the FBI's use of a powerful e-mail wiretap system.

The clause could help ensure the system, once known as Carnivore, doesn't collect more information than allowed by a warrant. Carnivore critics worry the device goes beyond traditional telephone wiretap laws and can gather data about non criminals.

"The concern about Carnivore has been its ability to collect too much information," said David Sobel, general counsel of the Electronic Privacy Information Center. "So, it really is critical to have some means of overseeing how the technique is actually used."

The e-mail system is a device installed at an Internet company to capture e-mails sent or received by criminal suspects.

Bush supports fast action to increase airway safety

WASHINGTON, D.C. — President Bush on Thursday urged fast action by Congress on a stalled aviation security bill and endorsed a House Republican approach as the quickest, most effective way to make the airways safer. House leaders promised a vote by Wednesday.

That vote will pit the House Republican bill against versions passed by the Senate on the issue of whether airport baggage screeners should become federal employees.

The Senate bill, passed 100-0, would make all screeners federal employees. House GOP leaders oppose creating many new federal jobs and would put the government in charge of overseeing, but not employing, airport security.

ASK THE FINANCIAL PLANNERS

I have been reading several articles about debt reduction. I was wondering if you knew what I could do to clean up my credit report.

Dear Student,

The first thing you should do is put your credit cards somewhere inaccessible. If you do have a poor credit rating and you cancel your credit cards, you could have trouble getting a new one. Just don't use your credit cards or take on any other new debt.

Your next step is to figure out where you stand. Sit down and create a budget. Begin to make your payments on time, even if it's the minimum amount.

After you have established your new payment plan, you need to obtain your credit report. You are allowed to contest anything that you feel is misstated in your credit report.

This attachment will be provided with every credit report that is requested. Finally, it is important for you to establish a habit of paying bills on time and stick with it. If you feel you are unable to do this alone, contact a local consumer credit counseling agency to help you.

Old car-bashing raises money for charity, relieves stress

BY KECIA N. SEYB
Kansas State Collegian

An early '80s Oldsmobile Custom Cruiser, license plate NNA 245, spray-painted with Jayhawk fanfare, spurred sledge-hammering hits Thursday in the Union Plaza.

"A POS, that's what it is," said Travis Gear, Phi Kappa Theta philanthropy chair.

Phi Kappa Theta fraternity brought the station wagon, donated by Mike's Wrecker Service, to campus to raise money for its philanthropy — Children's Miracle Network — allowing people to bash the car with a sledgehammer once for $1 or three times for $2.

"Hit Me Sissy," "Hawks Rock," "Rock Chalk Jayhawk" and "You swing like a wuss" appeared all over the car in red spray paint.

"It's like, sacrilegious to let this car sit here," Gear said to students as they stared at the vehicle as they walked by Thursday morning. "Take out your stress on this car."

Gear said one of the men in his pledge class came up with the idea as a fund-raiser. Gear said the fraternity members really didn't know what to do for their philanthropy because their house reopened last year after being closed for a year.

"We're the first real pledge class, so this is our shot to get something going," he said. "We don't have anything to compare it to. They didn't have a philanthropy last year."

Fraternity members removed all glass from the windows of the car to comply with the facility's wishes, Gear said. Mike's Wrecker Service donated the station wagon, and 84 Lumber provided plywood and a tarp to place under the car to catch pieces that fell. KJCK-FM 94.5 aired from the Plaza in support. Willie the Wildcat showed up and hit the car a few times, also.

Jamie Oder, sophomore in business, put on goggles — which participants had to wear when they hit — and bashed the car with a sledgehammer.

"It was really heavy," she said. "I don't usually get to sledgehammer cars, so it was a new experience for me."

But it was an enjoyable one, she said. Mark Vanderweide, senior in management information systems, said he also liked the car bashing because it helped relieve some stress.

"It felt kind of cool," he said. "It's hard to pass up whacking a KU car."

Vanderweide said he only had to hit the car once with the sledgehammer to leave his mark, and he said the car-bashing-as-a-fund-raiser idea was terrific.

"I liked it 'cause it was a different way of raising money. It's innovative, fun — it's just a good idea."

Gear said Children's Miracle Network is a worthy charity he doesn't want people to forget about.

"A lot of people are affected or know something about it," he said.

"We take so many things for granted that other kids won't have as much time to experience. This can help make something happen for them. Your childhood should be the best part of our life."

Children's Miracle Network is an international non-profit organization that helps children by raising funds and awareness for children's hospitals. The hospitals treat more than 14 million children afflicted with diseases, injuries and birth defects each year.

"Since the terrorist bombings — yeah, they need their money — but a lot of other charities are being left behind," Gear said. "We wanted to give to Children's Miracle Network because it's been left behind."

Gary Pratt, junior in finance and also a member of the 15-pledge, 14-active fraternity, said K-State students were not the only ones bashing the car.

"My physics instructor just comes up and takes a big chunk out of it. He took it as a souvenir," Pratt said. "The youngest was, like, 4 or 5, and the oldest wouldn't tell us, but he had to be in his 60s."

From 9 a.m. to 3 p.m. today people can bash a Chevy Blazer S-10 with license tag ODS 803, provided by an employee from Domino's.

"I actually own it," Pratt said. "They gave it to me."

Gear said the fraternity raised more than $100 and hoped to raise more today.

"Five hundred bucks would be awesome."

Willie the Wildcat prepares to take a swing at the "bash the car" philanthropy, which was sponsored by Phi Kappa Theta fraternity. The event took place to raise money for the Children's Miracle Network.

Bill Reay, professor of physics, participates in the "Bash the Car" event, sponsored by Phi Kappa Theta fraternity.

Postal Service launches mail checks nationwide as anthrax scare continues

BY DAVID ESPO
The Associated Press

WASHINGTON, D.C. — A State Department mail handler lay ill with inhalation anthrax Thursday and the besieged Postal Service set up spot checks at facilities nationwide as the bioterror scare widened.

"We still don't know who is responsible," said Homeland Security Director Tom Ridge.

At a White House news conference, Ridge also disclosed that the anthrax contained in mail addressed to Senate Majority Leader Tom Daschle had been altered to make it more of a threat.

"It is highly concentrated. It is pure and the spores are smaller," he said.

"Therefore they're more dangerous because they can be more easily absorbed in a person's respiratory system."

Ridge identified the strain of anthrax used in the U.S. attacks as Ames, a substance named for the university city in Iowa, and used in American bio weapons research and in vaccine testing.

Three weeks into the nation's unprecedented bioterrorism scare, lawmakers were permitted to return to several of their office buildings on Capitol Hill.

And White House spokesman Ari Fleischer said there had been no evidence of anthrax exposure among officials there who came in contact with mail that went through an offsite machine where anthrax was detected earlier in the week.

"We are here to conduct the nation's business. We will not be frightened," said Secretary of State Colin Powell as he appeared before a Senate committee.

But there were words of caution elsewhere.

"We are very concerned about additional letters. We would be naive to think this is over yet," said Dr. Julie Gerberding of the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention.

There was further jolting news, a disclosure from officials in New Jersey that a postal worker was being watched for suspected inhalation anthrax, the discovery of two more areas of contamination in a still-closed Senate office building — and then the announcement from the State Department.

Thus far, an estimated 10,000 people have been given antibiotics as a precaution against contracting anthrax, many of them postal workers in New York, New Jersey and the nation's capital.

And in recent days, the Postal Service and Bush administration have launched an intensive effort to assure the safety of the mail system.

Daylight Savings Time to end

BY CORINNE BLENDER
Kansas State Collegian

The bright colors of fall drift down from the trees marking a change in seasons and a change in time. Clocks across the world will revert from Day-light Saving Time to standard time on the last Sunday in October.

"When it's light again in the morning that will help me get out of bed," Marie Pope, senior in elementary education, said. "I'm not a morning person."

At 2 a.m. Sunday, clocks will "fall back" adding another hour to the lives of many K-State students. However, most students will not benefit from the effects of gaining this hour, said James Maas, sleep expert and professor at Cornell University, Ithaca, N.Y.

Maas, who conducted a sleep study on college students in 1998, said students are very sleep deprived and gaining an extra hour of sleep will probably not effect most students.

"Students are not regular sleep/wake people," Maas said. "They have very yo-yoing schedules."

Students typically go to bed at random times each night and get up at irregular times. This contributes to sleep deprivation and how extra sleep can make a difference.

The dependence on an alarm to get up signals sleep deprivation. Maas said getting up each morning should not come by a signal from an alarm, but from a person's biological clock saying the body is rested.

The average college student spends 6.1 hours sleeping when they should be getting 9.25 hours, Maas said. Adjusting to the time change may effect how well a person feels after sleeping anywhere from an hour to a week, Maas said.

"I don't even notice if it gets dark earlier. I wasn't a boy scout, I don't go by the sun," Ryan Farrell, senior in advertising, said. "I just go by the time on the clock."

In fact, many college students will not go on the new time schedule, Maas said. When the clocks bump back to 1 a.m. many college students will stay up later. The extra hour will be spent at the bar, not sleeping.

But for those students looking to gain the most from the time change, Maas said there is hope. He said now is a good time get your own internal clock set. It can be done by setting a specific time to be in bed and a time to get up each morning.

"It's not a matter of my mind being conscious of the time change but rather my body," Farrell said. "It's controlled by the circadian rhythm — your sleep/wake cycle."

Maas said one way the extra hour can benefit students is to pay back some time to their sleep-debt bank accounts. Every minute put back into the bank, Maas said, will help improve reactions, productiveness and overall mood.

"I'm not really going to gain anything," Pope said. "It's just nice to know I got to sleep an extra hour. Now, if it was five hours of extra sleep then it might mean something."

Halloween is one of the few holidays where adults can act like children again, especially in a college town. Getting the chance to dress up and even trick-or-treat are not above college mentality. Most of us still are enticed with the idea of free candy and getting to dress up like something else for a night.

We thought we would share with you what we will be dressing up as for Halloween.

Michelle Bertuglia: A Collegian columnist. I think maybe Micah Hawkinson.
Nick Bratkovic: Johnny the Mullet Man.
Corbin H. Crable: I'll be sporting my most prized Halloween possession: my Pat Bosco mask. Or maybe I'll wear my life-size squirrel costume.

Nancy Hull: Either Janis Joplin or a Smurf — it's a toss-up.
J.J. Duncan: David Bowie circa

"Aladdin Sane."

Jamie Barrett: Curly.
Jessica Pitts: Mo.

April Middleton: and Larry.
Dan Smith: Bryan Scribner, editor in chief in his absence.

SCHOOL pride

Homecoming Week should unite students, alumni

Either you're sick of it, or you're sad it's almost over. This week, different organizations on campus have competed in All-University Homecoming events. They've not only shown pride in their organizations, but pride in the university as well.

Homecoming is a time for the K-State community to come together and celebrate K-State. It's also a chance to welcome back alumni.

I love the idea behind Homecoming Week. I get excited when I think about all of the school spirit people have shown throughout the week.

The K-State community should unite during Homecoming Week to show everyone our purple pride. However, it hasn't been this way in the past. The groups who show that the most spirit are the ones that get ridiculed for their efforts.

I know some people think the activities the greek community does to celebrate week are a little strange.

For some, wearing the same shirt for a week is no more than a sign of poor hygiene (However, most greeks do wash their shirt sometime during the week).

To me, it's all about pride. It's about pride in your sorority or fraternity and pride in your school.

The Homecoming chairs of greek houses have put months of preparation into this week. Each house wants to prove they are the most spirited group on campus. The greek organizations want to show pride in their houses and pride in K-State. I don't understand why students would ridicule those who show pride in their university. Most of the time, we don't ridicule fans at football games who exhibit excessive spirit. Instead, we smile and cheer louder ourselves. Maybe those who are apathetic about supporting K-State should learn a thing or two from the greeks.

Some people might claim Homecoming is geared toward the greek community.

They say there is a lack of activities for the involvement of the whole university. This might have been a valid argument in the past, but it no longer stands.

The All-University Homecoming Committee has revamped Homecoming week over the past few years. Efforts have been made to get the entire campus involved.

You can reap many benefits from getting involved in Homecoming.

You can use Homecoming activities as a stress reliever. Unwind from the stress of midterms and papers. Get involved, and you can take your mind off some of your school worries.

Homecoming activities are a great place to meet new people or hang out with old friends. Who really needs an excuse to socialize with other students?

This theory might be a little out there, but maybe we can help out the football team if we get involved in Homecoming Week. No one likes to be criticized for their failures. When we're doing poorly, we crave the support of others. I'm sure the football team doesn't feel very confident about their abilities when campus criticizes them for a streak of bad games.

If everyone showed pride and spirit in K-State, maybe it would make the football players feel just a little more confident. Homecoming is the perfect chance to show we're not fair-weather fans. I'm not sure if showing our spirit will help us win games, but it couldn't hurt to try.

The main reason for Homecoming is to welcome back alumni. If I were an alumna, I would much rather see students showing their pride in the school rather than using the Campus Fourum to bash those who do show spirit.

My personal theory is, alumni will be more willing to give back to the university if we show them how excited we are about K-State. It's important to show our purple pride if we want to maintain strong alumni support.

Although the festivities are almost over for this year, you still have a few chances left to show your spirit before next year. You can head down to Aggieville this afternoon to watch the parade. Hey, you might even meet a new friend while you're unwinding from all of the stress of midterms.

True personalities should not be masked from world

I have always wondered what kind of people get surveyed for the "I've learned..." posters.

You know, the ones that start out with, "I've learned... that you can't hide a piece of broccoli in a glass of milk (age 6)," or something like that. The words of wisdom are everywhere: on the Internet, on posters in classrooms and in books and magazines.

Do the people on the posters really believe in what they say, or do they form their quotes to what the public wants to hear?

I was at a K-State Student Union Bookstore the other day when I noticed one of those infamous posters leaning up against a wall, and I began to evaluate my own actions. Sometimes, I am not aware of the changes I make when I am faced with various situations. It is not that I am trying to be someone I am not, but rather, I am concealing parts of my personality I do not want exposed.

Everyone does this.

I portray a serious, studious attitude during the week and an easy-going, party attitude on the weekends. People all over the world display different characteristics in different situations. It is all a part of the ritual we know as "wearing a mask."

Amber Koehn

Some people act completely different around their family than they do around friends. Every action is a part of that person's personality; however, to fit in or make a good impression, certain traits are displayed in some situations while certain traits are hidden in others.

This is why I get puzzled when I think about the people in the "I've learned..." posters. Do they really believe in what they say, or are they just trying to be clever to impress a certain audience?

Paul Laurence Dunbar's poem, "We Wear the Mask," suggests we wear masks for certain purposes and we should not let the world see us for our true selves. By wearing masks, we conform to the norms of society.

I think we should dare to let the world see who we really are and not hide from the very qualities that make us truly special individuals. For Dunbar to suggest we eternally hide our true personalities from the world, means he is suffering from some kind of fear of nonconformity, and does not want anyone to see his true personality.

The whole mask concept is really apparent with one of my friends, Jane Doe, for lack of a more original anonymity, has the reputation of being two-faced, and I think this comes from the fact she is insecure about herself and doesn't think anyone will like her unless she changes her actions to fit in.

What my friend neglects to understand is that the world is filled with vast amounts of variety. No matter how petty some people might be, plenty of people are willing to accept others for who they really are, not the roles they choose to display.

She shouldn't worry about what other people would think if they knew she still sleeps with a Care Bear blanket she's had since she was two, or that she tight-rolls her jeans. She should realize she is loved no matter what.

However, she is not the only person who needs to realize this. We all do.

We live in a society where people are ridiculed and outcast simply because they are different from others. I admit it is a sad situation when people stoop to such low levels, but it is a problem in this society full of freedoms. People are afraid to express who they really are simply because of the hatred or violence facing them.

Whatever happened to freedom of expression or any of the other freedoms so often sacrificed by people afraid of being who they truly are?

People simply are so afraid of getting hurt that they sacrifice their true personalities for alter egos more acceptable in today's society.

Whether it is to make a boss admire them, or attract a love interest, or just fit in with society, people all are guilty of hiding parts of their true selves and letting others see them for only the certain traits they carefully express. No matter how hard the world tries to see each individual in his/her true state, it never will be able to, because nobody will let it. Only each individual knows who they really are.

So, when someone says, "I've learned... osmosis is the best way to study for an exam while intoxicated (age 23)," you'd better make sure that person isn't putting on a mask just to impress his fraternity buddies.

And the next time you come across one of those "I've learned..." posters, read Dunbar's poem and take a real good look at yourself and others. Do people really believe, "Happiness is like perfume: you can't give it away without getting a little on yourself (age 57)," or is that what their "mask" believes?

The reason people stayed for the Aggies band is because they are good and actually move around on the field and don't just stand in one spot.

I will stand up and cheer for the K-State band when they are half as entertaining as the Texas A&M band.

You know, I am not embarrassed by the recent losing streak, but I am at the student response to it. For one of the best fan bases in the nation we sure don't show it. Go K-State.

If we lose this weekend, we are going to have to defend our goal post from being torn down?

-U.S. economy worsening; economists predict recession inevitable

BY MARTIN CRUTSINGER
The Associated Press

WASHINGTON, D.C. — Home sales and orders to factories for big-ticket items plunged in September, and the number of Americans drawing unemployment benefits now stands at an 18-year-high — the strongest evidence to date that the country has entered a recession.

"The bad news just keeps on coming," said Melani Jani, an economist at Salomon Smith Barney in New York. "The economy was already weak before Sept. 11, and these figures show the deterioration has become much more intense."

The Commerce Department reported Thursday that orders to factories for big-ticket durable goods fell for a fourth consecutive month in September, a decline of 8.5 percent that was six times larger than economists expected.

Sales of existing homes fell by 11.7 percent, the biggest one-month drop in six years, the National Association of Realtors reported. The association said the shock of the attacks caused housing sales, along with other economic activity, to come to a standstill.

The Labor Department said the number of newly laid-off workers filing for unemployment benefits rose to 504,000 last week, a level usually associated with recessions, while the total number of unemployed collecting benefits rose to an 18-year-high of 3.65 million people, 66 percent above the level of a year ago.

A final report showed that Americans' wages and benefits rose by 4.1 percent in the 12 months ending in September, compared to a 4.3 percent increase last year.

A recession is traditionally defined as two consecutive quarters of declining economic output. The gross domestic product grew at a barely discernible annual rate of 0.3 percent in the April-June quarter.

Many analysts believe when the GDP figure for July-September quarter is released Wednesday, it will show GDP falling at a rate of around 1 percent with the decline expected to accelerate to a 2 percent drop in the current quarter.

While economists had been expecting a rebound early next year, many said they are revising those forecasts down, in part because of the new uncertainties raised by threats of anthrax and other bioterror attacks.

"Clearly, anything that hits consumer confidence is bad for the economy. The real question is how bad will it be," said David Wyss, chief economist at Standard & Poor's Co. in New York.

A SECOND SERVING

Senior outside hitter Liz Wegner goes up for the spike against Texas Tech's Angela Mooney and Skydra Orzen at Wednesday night's game. The Cats won the match, three games to one.

Volleyball squad ready for weekend Nebraska match

BY DAN SMITH
Kansas State Collegian

The K-State volleyball team is looking to end the week on a high note Saturday night at Nebraska Coliseum when the Cats take on No. 2 Nebraska.

After falling to the Huskers earlier this season in Manhattan in three games, senior outside hitter Liz Wegner said a different team will make the trip north this weekend.

"I think we're getting better and better, and I think we're ready to take them on and a lot of things in our game have improved," Wegner said.

Wegner led K-State in the teams' first meeting this season with 18 kills and 11 digs on Oct. 1, but 28 hitting errors on the part of the Cats translated to lost opportunities and a Husker win.

Wegner said a focus on eliminating those errors in practice has helped K-State a great deal coming into this weekend's match, and the team should be able to gauge how far they've come against a tough Husker squad that has a knack for creating tough situations.

"We're working on making less errors and serving a lot tougher and I think that will be key going up there," she said.

K-State enters the match following an emotional four-set win over Texas Tech on Wednesday night. The Cats committed only 19 hitting errors through three games against the Red Raiders, while tallying a .207 team hitting percentage. While both teams have been on a roll lately, Nebraska has the longer streak.

The Huskers enter Saturday's match winners of their last 16 matches after dismissing Missouri in four games Wednesday night. Nebraska also carries a 41-match Big 12 winning streak into the matchup.

But as much as numbers like those could intimidate a team going into Nebraska's backyard, Wegner said the team is looking

"We're starting to really get into rhythm. We're starting to go right off the bat, and we're starting to play some pretty good volleyball, and this is a good time to start playing it."

Lisa Mimick
senior outside hitter forward to not only playing well against the Huskers, but beating them.

"We love going up there and playing," she said.

"It's a great environment to play in, and I'm definitely excited, and I think we have a really great chance of going up there and knocking them off."

To do that, K-State will have to find a way of stopping red-hot Husker Nancy Metcalf.

Against the Tigers, the outside hitter registered 23 kills and 13 digs along with three service aces to pace Nebraska. It was the senior's ninth double-double of the season.

Metcalf has helped the Huskers to an undefeated record at home this season heading into Saturday's matchup. Senior outside hitter Lisa Mimick said the Huskers' success at home so far this year is impressive, but the Cats' improvement could surprise some people.

"Going up to Nebraska, it's their house, but it's twice as sweet beating them at their house," she said. "Right now, we're playing some good ball so hopefully we can pull it off up there."

"We're starting to really get into a rhythm," Mimick said. "We're starting to go right off the bat, and we're starting to play some pretty good volleyball, and this is a good time to start playing it."

Starting freshman sets players up for success, works on technique

BY LAURA BOYD
Kansas State Collegian

Freshman Gabby Guerre came to K-State knowing she was walking into a great volleyball program. What she didn't know was how important her role in that program would be.

"I knew there were high expectations for me as a freshman," Guerre said. "I also knew I had to work harder to prove myself."

If Guerre was nervous at the start of the season, she was determined not to show it in her starting role.

"Gabby was a steady player from the beginning," head coach Suzie Fritz said. "If she was nervous, I didn't see it because she was always composed and is very mature for a freshman."

Her teammates will agree there is added pressure being a freshman, but Guerre knows how to step up and make herself known.

"I admit that I expect more from her as a senior," Senior outside hitter Lisa Mimick said. "The Big 12 is a tough conference and she is really doing an excellent job."

Guerre said she truly believes she has earned the trust of the seniors.

"It is important to earn the seniors' trust to gain confidence," Guerre said. "They are really opening up to me and are a great support system."

With sophomore setter Laura Downey out due to injury, Guerre's role on the team has become much more important.

As a true freshman, the 6-foot-1-inch setter has been given the opportunity to make her mark early in her career and is succeeding in doing just that.

"Gabby really earned her position," Fritz said. "She has worked hard to learn the system and get comfortable in the system."

However, Guerre stills sees a lot of room for improvement and even admits to what she calls freshman mistakes.

"I have a lot of internal and external expectations," Guerre said. "I have to be patient with myself because I know it is not all going to happen tomorrow."

Guerre's height and ability have made her a asset on the court. Her ability to be a versatile player has put the freshman in the spotlight, not only for her skills as a setter, but also for her improved blocking and hitting in games.

"She can really attack the net and read the block," senior hitter Liz Wegner said. "Her great setting has also made the hitters more effective."

Guerre said all those skills will be important this weekend against No. 2 Nebraska. She said she knows the team needs to get ahead early and keep fighting until the end.

"Whoever starts off better has a better chance of winning," Guerre said.

Guerre said K-State has the passion needed to win big games, as was seen against Texas Tech in the team's big win Wednesday. Emotions ran high with a tough call against a hit by Liz Wegner in the final game.

"There were just looks of anger," Guerre said. "Tough games really bring out the passion in the team and makes us tough."

Guerre is quick to say she already can see improvement in her own game.

"I have a lot of time here and my extra work is starting to show little by little," Guerre said.

She said she also looks forward to the spring season as an opportunity to work on her technique, strength and conditioning, and come back even stronger next year.

"Gabby is working hard and improving every day," Fritz said. "With her, the sky's the limit."

Gabby Guerre prepares to serve the ball at Wednesday night's game. Guerre had four kills for the night.

KSU tennis competing in regional meet

BY DAN SMITH
Kansas State Collegian

K-State got an opportunity to see how much close to a month of preparation helped out this week at the Intercollegiate Tennis Association's Regional Championships in Tulsa, Okla.

"Even though no team scores are kept, this will be a measure of where we are," Coach Steve Bietau said before the tournament's qualifying round Wednesday. "I'm interested in seeing what kind of progress we have made since Georgia."

Sophomores Hayley McIver and Paulina

Castillejos competed in the 32-player qualifying round that began Wednesday. McIver was seeded third with a 3-1 fall record, and Castillejos was ranked seventh at 1-3.

Needing to win two rounds to advance to the main draw on Thursday, McIver was upset in the first round by Oklahoma State's Erin Pauchnick, 6-4, 3-6, 6-3. Castillejos had more success in her match, beating Northern Arizona's Ashley Bille in straight sets, 6-1, 6-3.

Castillejos' first round win set up a match against Kansas' Paige Brown later in the day, but in the second round, the sophomore fell in two games, 6-2, 6-4.

Seniors Alena Jecminkova and Kathy

Chuda, junior Petra Sedlmajerova and freshman Maria Rosenberg all competed in the tournament's main draw of the regional Thursday.

Jecminkova, the tournament's top seed, defeated BYU's Dominique Reynolds in straight sets, 6-1, 6-2, and No. 5 Petra Sedlmajerova beat Kristina Olshanskaya of Missouri 6-2, 6-3. Rosenberg, ranked ninth, lost in three games to BYU's Lisa Khoudorova, 2-6, 7-6, 6-4, and results for Chuda's match were not released.

Jecminkova and Sedlmajerova both will play today, and the tournament concludes on Sunday at the Tulsa Southern Tennis Club.

Events at baseball game mirror realities in life

People often have said that life imitates art. As it turns out, life imitates sports, too.

Case in point: the sight of fans scrambling to retrieve home run balls has always been commonplace. The race to the ball has increased in intensity in recent years with players like Mark McGwire, Sammy Sosa and, most recently, Barry Bonds chasing and/or breaking the single-season home run record.

But even though the fans often look like football players diving for a fumble, the scene usually is fairly docile.

That all changed, when Bonds hit his final home run Oct. 7 at San Francisco's Pac Bell Park. When the pile of fans fighting for the historic ball was finally sorted out, Patrick Hayashi emerged with the ball and was quickly escorted away by Major League Baseball security.

As a result, Hayashi had a potential seven-figure baseball in his possession.

Or not. On Wednesday, Alex Popov, a Berkeley, Calif., restaurateur who exited the Bonds-homer pile with only bruises, was granted a temporary injunction by the California Superior Court that prevents the sale or concealment of the ball. Popov contends that he originally caught the ball, but had it taken from him when a stampeding horde of fans tap-danced on his face in an effort to get the ball. Hayashi was a member of that horde, and, Popov said, he also hit a young boy during the melee.

Until ownership is determined, the ball will sit in a safe deposit box in a

Prevention of spreading diseases topic of lecture

BY RYAN DONAHUE
Kansas State Collegian

In 1967, William Stewart, U.S. Surgeon General, proclaimed, "The time has come to close the book on infectious diseases."

Since the 1970s, 30 new infectious diseases have emerged worldwide. During his lecture Wednesday night, Byron Wood said he believed the former Surgeon General was a tad grandiose in his proclamation.

Wood is a program scientist with the Office of Strategic Planning in the Astrobiology and Space Research Directorate at NASA's Ames Research Center.

Wood presented the research he and his office has conducted over the past year in regards to surveillance and the possible spreading of infectious diseases.

Agencies such as the Center for Disease Control and the National Institute of Health originally were reluctant to embrace the research that Wood and his team were collecting.

"It's not in their mindset. It's not the way they do business," Wood said.

However, using existing satellite technology and other retrospective research, Wood has been able to map out potential risk factors for different disease regions worldwide.

The research conducted by Wood focuses primarily on when a disease most likely will become a potential risk and where those potential risk areas are.

During a study of a Lyme Disease outbreak in Connecticut, Wood was able to determine where the highest potential for contracting the disease was in a specific county.

Wood used NASA satellite information to map out the area and determine where prime breeding grounds for ticks in the county were located. Wood then correlated the information with reported cases of Lyme Disease in domestic animals and came up with a map telling him where the highest possible risk was for contracting Lyme Disease.

Most of the information collected by Wood's team has thus far only been used to tell where the disease has been. Wood said he believes his research can accurately predict where and when infectious disease will strike, allowing scientists to take protective and preventative measures.

As his research grows in credibility, agencies such as the CDC and NIH grow more open to new ways and ideas.

"Right now, those same agencies are starting their own projects similar to ours," Wood said.

Wood will speak again on remote surveillance of infectious diseases at 12:30 p.m. today in Ackert 221.

Byron Wood, a program scientist at NASA's Ames Research Center, discusses Thursday in which projects where existing data was combined with satellite imaging to determine the probability and location of disease outbreaks throughout the world.

Facility for capital punishment built

BY JOHN MILBURN
The Associated Press

LANSING, Kan. — In what once housed inmate records now stands the state's new facility for carrying out capital punishment.

The sun shining through opaque windows let in the only light on what was otherwise cold and sterile room at the Lansing Correctional Facility. More than 40 reporters got their first look at the chamber Thursday.

Kansas reinstated the death penalty in 1994, with work on the Lansing facility and execution procedures beginning shortly thereafter. Warden David McKune said the building was renovated at a cost of $400,000, with the death chamber constituting about $60,000 of that.

A team of 12 to 15 corrections officers — all volunteers — will carry out the execution, McKune said.

CARNIVAL

his classmates get involved in Homecoming Week.

"The College of Architecture isn't really able to spend time with Homecoming events, but we got to today for a couple minutes. Then, it's back to work," he said.

Macek said he wasn't interested in doing the inflatable bounce house, but Allison Harper, junior in kinesiology, and Ashley VanderPol, 8, said they enjoyed it.

Harper coaches VanderPol in a gymnastics class, and VanderPol said the moonwalk was good for doing gymnastics and other moves.

"Jumping," she said. "Front flips and landing on your back."

Harper said VanderPol definitely was ready for some purple cotton candy as VanderPol agreed and continued to bounce.

"Yeah, she wants sugar," Harper said.

Sarah Geiger, senior in agricultural business and committee member, said she also was excited about eating cotton candy.

"It's an enjoyable treat every now and then," she said. "It makes you feel like a kid again."

The location of the carnival — between Waters, Willard and Leisure halls and Hale Library — was perfect, Geiger said.

"This is going to catch some people between and after classes," she said.

"It's a fun place to stop by, jump around and get some cotton candy — just build general spirit for the weekend."

Titus, who is on the Homecoming Student Committee for her second year, said she thinks the event went really well, as has the entire Homecoming Week so far.

"So far, so good. It's gone smoothly," she said.

"This is a huge thing for me because I'm not greek. Since my first year, I've made sure it's not a greek thing. It's a K-State thing."

SENATE

he said administrators also are considering a cost distinction between lower level and upper level classes with courses above 300 being more expensive. Another option would be to charge students from different colleges different tuition rates, he said.

Students are the only ones who will oppose the increases because administrators and faculty members are the ones who will benefit from them, he said.

"We need to figure out where we stand as students," he said. "If the administration doesn't hear from students, you're going to see an increase in tuition you're not going to be happy with."

He said he encourages senators to attend the tuition informational presentations at all of the upcoming college council meetings.

In other action, Ali Karimi, a College of Arts and Sciences senator, introduced a bill proposing a $1,000 cap on student body presidential election campaign spending.

This bill would prevent campaigns from exceeding the average student's financial means, Karimi said.

"Previous candidates have spent huge amounts of money I believe the average student can't afford," he said. "It'll force candidates to go out and talk to students."

Senators will be able to debate the bill at next week's meeting.

They also declared that Nov. 11-16 will be Governmental Awareness and Public Service Week.

During the week, Spencer Steljes, governmental relations chair, said there will be panels consisting of state, local and university government representatives available for students to ask questions.

GAS PRICES

dealer. In the next five years, Dillons officials predict this amount will rise to 15 percent.

"We are taking this on aggressively because there is going to be a change in the fuel market," fuel manager Brian Andrews said in a previous interview. "It's a new trend in the industry."

Also contributing to the low prices is September's terrorist attacks, but Crough said consumers have continued purchasing gas.

"I think the American public is trying to keep consuming high," he said. "That's probably where the gas drop came from in the first place."

With air travel down, oil used for jet fuel was converted to automobile fuel, flooding the market with even more gas, the AAA said.

Supply usually is larger than demand at this time of year because of few family vacations and drivers staying home.

Despite this, Crough said he thinks prices will stay stable for a while.

"Chances are, it will go up and down," he said. "Nothing drastic, though."

BASEBALL

San Francisco bank.

Now, the courts are forced to take a page from the NFL book and examine instant replay. A local TV station cameraman caught the scene on tape, but the result, so far inconclusive, Hayashi's lawyer Don Tamaki told ESPN.

"I've seen the tape, and I don't think any of the visuals support what they are saying," Tamaki said.

"(Popov) says he clearly caught the ball. Well, you see the ball striking the glove, and he's got a snowcone, but beyond that, the ball just disappears."

Thus, life imitates sports.

The game is not on the field, but in the stands. With hundreds, or even millions, of dollars resting on a single ball, it truly pays to be the fastest, strongest or most ruthless person in the stands. For those fans who are there just to see a game and not establish a retirement fund, the situation can be dangerous.

Everyone at one point or another has been a Patrick Hayashi — caught on the lumbotron dumbly watching a fly ball with one hand holding a snowcone and the other probably picking at a booger. It used to be that during those vulnerable moments, some heads-up person would reach over and snag the ball with a baseball glove.

Not anymore. Soon, shoulder pads and helmets might become required attire for watching baseball games because the little kid in the next seat will be holding not only an oversized mitt but a 44-ounce baseball bat.

Little did Theodore Roosevelt know how far-reaching his words could be when he said, "Speak softly and carry a big stick."

Even the larger-than-life ex-president would be frightened by the recent behavior by fans-turned-thugs.

If baseball fans, owners and players are not careful, they might lose the easy, majestic pace that typifies baseball. If that should happen — if violence, including on-field brawls, continues to entrench itself in the game of baseball, only one word will describe the result.

Hockey.

Brad Majors

Oh, the horror

Halloween cult classic to thrill moviegoers

BY BECKY FISCHER
Kansas State Collegian

Boys will be girls, and girls will be boys. At least for one night, anyway. The annual showing of "The Rocky Horror Picture Show" provides students with the opportunity to break away from the norm, said Melanie Bean, Union Program Council's Classic Films Committee chair and one of the two masters of ceremonies for the movie.

"You don't have to dress in drag, but a lot of people do," Bean said. "I've seen more guys in dresses than girls at this event. It's one tradition of the show."

What makes the show interesting, Bean said, is that it's more than just a movie.

"There's a lot of traditional components to the night," she said. "K-State is relatively conservative, and this is the wildest, strangest thing I've seen here."

The night consists of activities to keep the audience active before and during the showing of the film, Bean said. Two of those activities are a costume contest and a virgin auction.

"First-timers to the movie are referred to as Rocky virgins," Bean said. "We ask them to come up on stage to be sold off. People bid for them with things like lint and coins - whatever they've got in their pockets. It's a good time."

One of the craziest bids Bean said she's witnessed involved a girl, who was a Rocky virgin, dressed as Satan, and a bidder dressed as Jesus.

"This will be my third year as MC, so I know what I'm doing," she said. "The crowd never gets bad, but we just like to keep things in order a bit. The funnest part about being an MC, though, is that we do whatever comes to us. There aren't any restrictions."

Each attendee is given a bag of traditional necessities, including rice, newspaper and coins, to be used during the show. During certain scenes, the MC's direct the audience to use the props, Bean said.

The usage of props and other traditions developed from the movie's spirit, Bean said. In "The Rocky Horror Picture Show" an engaged couple find themselves spending the night at an old castle after their car breaks down. At the castle, they are both seduced by Dr. Frank-N-Furter, a transvestite. By the end of the film the conservative couple learns to let go a bit.

The idea of letting go and not being judged for one night pays homage to the movie's themes, Bean said.

Activities during the movie include throwing rice at the screen and dancing, said Matt Morgan, junior in elementary education.

"There's just a lot of crazy stuff going on," Morgan said. "At one point, everyone gets up to dance. It doesn't matter if you can't dance. I don't have rhythm, so I got to make an ass of myself. No one cares."

Jeremy May, senior in anthropology, has gone to the show the past three years and said he's going again this year.

"I like the costumes. The transvestitism is fun," May said. "You never know what people are going to come dressed as."

A student dressed as a pimp was one of the coolest costumes May said he's seen.

"He had six hoes that he was bossing around for the night. It was crazy, but it was all in fun," May said.

Craziness can be expected at every showing of the film, May said.

"I've seen people walk out because it was totally different from what they're expecting," May said. "It's not just a movie you go to wearing a Halloween costume. Come with an open mind, and you'll have an awesome time."

Magenta

- Magenta is a somewhat deranged domestic in Dr. Frank-N-Furter's mansion in the movie.
- Those who go as Magenta commonly tease the hair to get it as big as hers.
- French maid outfits can work for Magenta's dress. It should be a black dress with white collar and cuffs and a white apron also can be worn over it.
- Fishnet hose are worn along with the outfit for an appropriately trashy look.
- Black granny boots can be tough to find but set the costume off nicely.

Tap Dogs to make 2nd appearance on KSU campus

Courtesy Art

BY CORBIN H. CRABLE
Kansas State Collegian

Fred Astaire and Ginger Rogers have nothing on these boys.

Having performed on the K-State campus in 1999, Dein Perry's Tap Dogs are returning to campus to perform.

Tap Dogs Tickets

Dein Perry's Tap Dogs will perform at 7 p.m. Sunday at McCain Auditorium. Tickets are $17.50 for students and children, $35 for the general public and are available at the McCain Auditorium box office, 532-6428.

Based in Australia, Tap Dogs incorporates tap dancing with raw masculinity and stunning lights and music, said Richard Martin, director of McCain.

"It's probably the most unusual thing we're presenting this semester," he said. "It's got a contemporary score, and it's based on a gritty kind of industrial work experience that the creator of Tap Dogs had. It's some of the most easily accessible entertainment you can possibly imagine."

Tap Dogs incorporates a setting of men at a construction site with fast-paced music and dance, said Thom

Jackson, marketing and development officer for McCain.

"It originated in Australia by a guy who was studying dance and couldn't get a job as a tap dancer, so he worked on construction sites," Jackson said. "He had a group of his friends who were in shows, and he did some of those, and they mounted their show on the construction experience."

"It updates the tap genre into the new-age style, where it's very rugged and has a tough side."

The group, which performs in North America, Asia and Europe, has caught the attention of K-State students and people in the community, Jackson said.

"We've sold 1,300 of our 1,800 seats," he said. "Considering we sold almost 600 tickets then (1999), and now we've sold 1,300, that says this is a very hot show."

The show, however, isn't so hot that the audience won't be able to keep cool.

"Audience members in the front might get wet," Jackson said. "These guys tap dance in water, and they kind of play in it."

Martin said he is pleased that lovers of live entertainment are flocking to buy tickets this time around.

"So many people who saw it once want to see it again," he said.

"When you take an art form and move the boundaries of what an average person expects out of a tap show, it turns into a vast spectacle."

"I'm beginning to believe these guys can tap dance on any flat surface."

Besides the jeans and T-shirt-clad men, Jackson said audiences will marvel at the sets, which include metal scaffolding, and the rock music and array of lights.

"It is such a visual experience. It's awesome, very high energy with a great light show," Jackson said. "It has its own niche because it is something no one else is doing. This is not a musical, it's not a ballet. It's racy tap that's not confined, as other tap is."

Martin said he thinks it's important that audience members come to the show with no preconceived notions of what tap dancing should be, and that they should expect to experience an evening of energetic entertainment.

"You have to come with open eyes and open ears," he said.

"You have to want to have a good time."

HALLOWEEN

Fun for all ages

Trick or Treat

Going out on Halloween to trick-or-treat is not just for kids. Many costumed students will be making door-to-door stops to try and earn as much candy as possible.

BY NANCY HULL
Kansas State Collegian

Kids planning their witch and superhero costumes aren't the only ones counting down the days until Halloween.

Many K-State students are making big plans for the holiday.

Ryan Barefoot, senior in business management and business marketing, and about 40 of his friends came up with costume ideas for the night — dressing up as characters from the movie "Hoosiers."

They'll be basketball players, band members and cheerleaders from the movie.

Barefoot said he usually doesn't go all-out for Halloween.

"This year I decided that it's Halloween, and it's my last year, so what the heck? I might as well," he said.

The group even has a short, yellow school bus to ride around in.

"We downloaded the theme song from the movie to play before we get on and off the bus to set the scene," he said.

He said they'll probably go to a couple house parties and then head to Rusty's Last Chance Restaurant and Saloon to enter the costume contest.

Outfits for the group were ordered off the Internet, and the students will even carry instruments.

A store is making red jerseys and gold shorts for the basketball players. A member's mom is making the cheerleading outfits.

Pam Miller, owner of Marie's Costumes, said students started reserving costumes in August.

They've asked for a little bit of everything, she said, from Dracula to Harry Potter to Osama bin Laden.

"And they're always into weird band members that I've never heard of," Miller said.

Kelli Benton, Marie's employee and junior in elementary education, said a lot of students want to be flappers and gangsters.

"I think that's because they're from a different time," she said.

Students also look for outfits that work well for costume date parties, like the Spartan cheerleaders from Saturday Night Live.

Benton said students who come in are very excited about dressing up.

"They run around and try on lots of different costumes with their friends," she said.

At the Halloween Boutique in Manhattan Town Center, Tassel Twirling Tessie — a fat suit outfit for men, has been selling fast.

Pimps, strippers, pirates and devils also are popular with college students, Ilona Cookman, sales associate, said.

She said they want to dress like things related to taboo subjects.

"They want what's going to get 'Oh, my God, I can't believe you're getting that,'" she said.

Students don't want normal costumes, Cookman said.

"They don't want to be a normal witch," she said.

"They want things that require more imagination."

Same song, different verse. When K-State and Kansas meet at KSU Stadium on Saturday afternoon, it will mark the Wildcats' fifth try for their first Big 12 win this year. Saturday's contest also marks the latest the Cats have gone winless in conference play since 1989, when K-State went 0-7 to begin Big Eight play during head coach Bill Snyder's first season in Manhattan.

One positive sign, Snyder said, might be that the Cats began to show signs of breaking out of that funk during the fourth quarter of last week's game against Texas A&M, an indication that the team might be starting to play consistently better.

"We had a tremendous punt return that set out the opportunity to try to win the ballgame, and we were playing so well on defense that it was three-and-out, and that's what you strive for," he said.

"When you look at it, it wasn't the offense, it wasn't the defense, it wasn't the kicking game — it was all of it. It was all together, and that period of time was probably the best that we have played at any time this year."

And with this weekend's game carrying bowl implications for both teams, the annual matchup of arch rivals carries added significance this season, Snyder said.

"I would like to think, no matter who you were going to line up against, that there would be a tremendous amount of motivation to become better, to have success," Snyder said. "I think that's why we play the game, and I think under any circumstances that they would be motivated to do so."

"I think it makes sense that if there is a need for additional motivation beyond what they have, maybe this traditional rival game could provide that."

This year's contest is a break from the norm, though. K-State has taken the last eight meetings in the series, and the Jayhawks' last win in Manhattan came in 1989. But with both teams entering Saturday's matchup losers in four of their last five games, no clear advantage exists for either school.

Still, senior safety Jon McGraw said, K-State is more than ready to extend the streak to nine games this weekend.

"We're excited going into this ballgame," McGraw said. "It's a great history of rivalry between these two teams, and we are excited that we're going to play a very much improved KU football team."

Even more encouraging than the Cats' recent

Game 7: Kansas

Date & Time: Saturday, 2:30 CST — Pay per view
Series: KU leads, 61-32-5
Facts: K-State and KU are playing for the Governor's Cup this weekend at KSU Stadium. The Jayhawks have won 16 of the 30 games since the trophy was established in 1969, but the Cats currently hold an eight-game winning streak against the Jayhawks in the series.

success over the Jayhawks is K-State's record in Homecoming games. The Cats have won 11 straight Homecoming contests, a streak stretching back to 1989.

One of the elements of those teams was a stingy defense. This year's team is no different heading into the KU game, McGraw said. One week removed from an impressive showing against Texas A&M, the Cat defense is ready to get back on track.

"That was one of our big focuses from last week in practice for going into the game, that we really need to get that mentality and attitude back," McGraw said.

"We brought back that mentality by the way we tackled and covered."

Going up against that K-State defense will be a much-improved KU offense, powered by senior wideout Roger Ross and redshirt freshman QB Mario Kinsey.

"Offensively, their use of the quarterback has made them a dangerous offense," Snyder said. "He can pull the ball down and scramble with it, he can run some option, and he can run some of the quarterback run game."

Running isn't the only part of Kinsey's game, though. Against Missouri last week, Kinsey completed 13 of 25 passes for 242 yards and two touchdowns. Five of those completions were to Ross, a threat in any scheme, but especially dangerous in the Jayhawks' spread passing attack.

"They have some very, very confident wide receivers," Snyder said. "From that standpoint, I think that they could spread the field on you and make it difficult to defend the passing game with four wide outs, and at the same time, it puts even more pressure on you knowing what Kinsey can do."

But McGraw said the secondary is up to whatever challenge KU brings to the table on Saturday.

"They have a number of weapons, just like most teams in the Big 12 do," he said. "That will be a challenge for us but we'll be ready."

Junior quarterback Marc Dunn tries to elude Texas A&M's Christian Rodriguez in last week's 31-24 loss. Dunn nearly engineered a 21-point comeback in the second half against the Aggies. Dunn's increased progress and an injury to sophomore quarterback Eli Roberson may mean Dunn's second start this weekend against Kansas.

Dunn prepares for second start against KU

BY DEREK BOSS

Kansas State Collegian

Head coach Bill Snyder has been facing an unusual situation this season.

Not only is his team off to its worst start since 1989 — Snyder's first year in the program — but he's dealing with a pair of quarterbacks lacking one intrinsic component: Experience.

Neither Eli Roberson nor Marc Dunn had started a Division I-A football game prior to this season, and coupled with Roberson's ankle injury against Colorado, K-State is still winless in Big 12 Conference play.

"We've normally been fortunate to have youngsters with a great deal of experience, or at least two and three-year guys," Snyder said. "But everyone has to start at some point in time. Jonathan Beasley had to get on the field for the first time — Michael Bishop, Matt Miller, Chad May — whoever it happened to be, everybody had their first time."

"So I wouldn't use it as a crutch and say that if we had an experienced quarterback we would be better. There's just a lot of things that need to take place, and they need to develop as fast as they possibly can."

But until Roberson can return to 100 percent, that lies in the hands of Dunn, who's expected to start this weekend against Kansas. Snyder said Roberson was unlikely to practice Tuesday, and listed his status as day-to-day.

"When we practice today, Marc will work as our No. 1 quarterback," Snyder said Tuesday.

Offensive coordinator Ron Hudson said that starting role is entirely based on Roberson's injury, though.

"It's just because we're not sure what Eli's status is right now," Hudson said.

Not that Dunn's last outing against Texas A&M should deter him from any playing time, though. The junior college transfer nearly engineered a 21-point K-State comeback in the fourth quarter alone versus the Aggies, completing 8 of 11 passes for 69 yard and also rushing for a touchdown.

Dunn even got the Cats as close as the A&M three-yard line for the game-tying score, before Josh Scobey's option left on 4th and 3 was inches shy of the first down.

Despite still losing the contest, Hudson said Dunn's performance was as good as K-State could have hoped for in relief of Roberson, whose interception and fumble both led to Aggie touchdowns late in the third quarter.

"I think so, under those circumstances when you're down 31-10," Hudson said of Dunn. "We're pleased with what he did. We've just got to continue to get him better — it's only his second game. We've just got to keep right on pounding sand."

In fact, after the ball game, Snyder said Dunn's play earned him the right to more opportunities, regardless of Roberson's status.

But Hudson said Roberson's mistakes in the A&M game won't preclude him from playing time this season either, once he's healthy. Other than his two late-game mishaps, Hudson pointed to aspects of the offense that stalled several Roberson drives, which were primarily created thanks to the sophomore's success at running the option.

"The big things in Eli's drives were false starts — not lining up properly," Hudson said. "It's 14-0, and we get down to the four-yard line, and the wide receiver wasn't set. That's the difference."

"But is that Eli Roberson's fault? No, I don't think it is. I just think we had mental breakdowns in a lot of areas. There was a problem with communication."

Whatever the fault, Scobey said it's important for the quarterback to be a strong leader on the team, and he feels both Cat QBs exhibit that quality.

"We're confident in Marc and Eli," Scobey said. "However it plays out, we're confident in both of those guys, so whichever one it is, we feel like they can both get it done."

Dunn especially proved himself against A&M, Scobey said, after the junior struggled to complete just 16 of 40 passes versus Texas Tech the previous week.

"Marc is somewhat of a field general. You can feel his presence when he comes in," Scobey said. "He helped us catch back up last week and try and win that ball

Points from field position continue to haunt K-State

BY SEAN PURCELL

Kansas State Collegian

Just one week ago, K-State's fate rested in the hands of their offense.

Although the Wildcats had struggled for much of the Texas A&M game, momentum and excellent field position gave the fans hopes of a comeback victory in the final minutes of the fourth quarter.

But those hopes were not fulfilled as the Wildcats failed to score on 4th down and three from the Aggies' five.

A few plays prior, the stands erupted with chants of Aaron Lockett. K-State's defense had held Texas A&M and forced them to give the ball to the Cats with the game on the line.

As Lockett evaded tacklers left and right, the thought of K-State sending the game to overtime, or winning with a two-point conversation, came closer to becoming a reality. Lockett's return ended at the 23 yard line of Texas A&M, and K-State was in striking distance.

Play after play, however, the Cats were held in check and denied of snapping their recent losing streak.

On the opposite side of the football, Texas A&M capitalized when given decent field position.

After a Lockett punt-return fumble late in the third quarter, the Aggies chipped in a field goal from 42 yards out. It was the first of three possessions in which the Cats surrendered great field position to A&M.

With 2:50 remaining in the third quarter, quarterback Eli Roberson dropped back and hit Aggie linebacker Brian Gamble with a pass intended for Josh Scobey. Gamble was stopped short of the touchdown but it only delayed the inevitable. Texas A&M punched it in just two plays later.

Then, when it seemed it couldn't get any worse, it did.

Forty ticks remained in an already brutal quarter when Roberson was hit by Christian Rodriguez, disrupting the pitch to running back Josh Scobey. Jarrod Penright recovered the loose ball and returned it 17 yards for the score.

K-State had dug itself a hole by giving Texas A&M just what every team wants — field position.

"It's a big part of the game," Scobey said. "You have to score when given the opportunities and they did that."

Compared to the 17 points the Aggies were able to score when given the ball inside K-State territory, the Cats managed just seven. In the end, it wasn't what the Cats did when given the chance to score, it is what they didn't do.

"You have to use the field position that is given to you," Lockett said. "When you get that close, you have to score points, point blank."

Kelly Glasscock/Collegian

Senior punt returner Aaron Lockett runs past Texas A&M punter Cody Scates last weekend. Lockett's 52-yard punt return in the final minutes of the game put K-State in good field position but the offense fell short on fourth down.

Injuries force Cats to choose alternatives; redshirts, reserves see more playing time

BY SEAN PURCELL
Kansas State Collegian

Like a casualty list that grows with each game, people have begun to wonder if the Cats can respond to the challenges they face by finding a way to win the next battle.

But the players and coaches are confident this team can respond to the adversity.

"K-State is very team-oriented," wide receiver Brandon Clark said.

"You know when someone goes down, someone else has to step up."

Clark is just one of many players, especially on the offensive side, who has been hampered by one injury or another. Clark missed last week's game due to a foot injury.

Where K-State has really suffered in terms of injuries, however, is on the offensive line. Starting lineups have varied from game to game, causing a possible lack of team chemistry.

In the opener against Southern California, the line surrendered only two sacks. Those numbers continued to grow in games against Colorado and Texas Tech, where a total of 11 sacks were allowed.

Most recently against Texas A&M, K-State's line stood strong and held the Aggies to just one sack on quarterback Marc Dunn.

These efforts might prove the offensive line is learning to deal with the conditions they face.

"We are doing the best we can with what we got," lineman Andy Eby said.

"This doesn't happen too often, so you have to hope your back-ups can step it up."

One of those players asked to step in for an injured teammate has been redshirt freshman Jon Doty.

Doty came into the K-State system as a tight end, but those plans quickly changed — much to the chagrin of Doty.

"I wasn't too excited about the switch to line," he said. "Sometimes you do what is best for the team."

With the loss of three predicted starters on the offensive line, Doty quickly moved up the depth chart.

Then, when linemen Oshin Honarchian and Ben Rettele left Saturday's game due to injury, Doty got the call.

In retrospect, the transition has been unbelievable, he said.

"I was very surprised with what has happened," Doty said. "If you asked me in the summer if I had a chance to play, I would say there would be no way, but things change."

QB Marc Dunn said he was impressed by the way Doty responded in the Texas A&M game.

Although there has been uncertainty in the past, he said players have stepped in to fill the holes vacated by injuries.

"The last few weeks we started to worry, because we didn't know who would step up," Dunn said. "I have been very pleased with the dedication players have showed to this team."

Although things might have changed, some things have stayed the same.

"We are not any more healthy than we were a week ago," Snyder said.

"However, no matter who we have in, I have been pleased with their ability to rise to the occasion as best they can."

Perhaps one of the biggest blows to the offense this season was the career-ending leg injury to John Robertson against Texas Tech.

Robertson, a cornerstone of the offensive line, had started 29 straight games for the Cats. Eby said it's tough not seeing the senior out there with him.

"It's hard on a guy when you play for so long to go through something like this," he said. "I really feel for him."

Snyder said the lack of healthy bodies has turned into a distraction each day in practice. A coaching style of going hard in each practice has been hard to accomplish with such health issues.

"We can't practice the way we want to practice each day," Snyder said.

"It's hard to have the best go against the best because we don't have enough people to do it, and we don't have the health to do it."

Despite the troubles the Cats might face due to injury, Clark said he is certain the team will do whatever it takes to beat Kansas this weekend.

"Sometimes things like this break up the chemistry of a team," he said.

"I think not only the line, but the team has come together during these times."

Senior offensive lineman John Robertson is helped off the field after suffering an injury against Texas Tech. Head coach Bill Snyder said that Robertson's injury will keep him out for the rest of the season, leaving another hole on the offensive line.

Wildcats' kicking struggles push Rheem into starting role against Jayhawks

BY MICHAEL NOLL
Kansas State Collegian

K-State's kicking woes were infamous during its first five games. The Cats missed six extra points and more than half of their field goals.

Then, against Texas A&M last Saturday, kicker Jared Britte made two points after touchdown but needed plenty of luck to do so. The first kick bounced off and over the crossbar, and the second bounced off an Aggie helmet and over the crossbar.

The fluke kicks were enough for head coach Bill Snyder, so he pulled the redshirt off of freshman Joe Rheem, who kicked K-State's final PAT. The result was a textbook display of kicking, which was no surprise to Snyder.

to believe he could do what we needed to have done."

Now, Rheem is the Cats' starting kicker, a position he is ready to assume.

"I'm just going out there thinking I'm going to be the guy," Rheem said. "I don't want to go in there thinking I'm not the guy and have to be in there. So I have to have in my mindset that I'm going to be the guy."

Rheem also will handle kickoffs, an area in which K-State also has struggled.

"I think if I'm going to kick field goals, they're going to let me have a chance to go ahead and kick off, too, because I don't want to be doing just one thing now that I'm out of my redshirt," Rheem said.

While Rheem might be the guy for K-State right now, his chances of starting looked much dimmer at the beginning of the season. In high school, kickers are allowed to use tees for field goals and PAT's, but in college, the holder just sits the ball on the ground.

"I was struggling to tell you the truth," Rheem said. "I wasn't getting the ball up at all, hitting it barely above the crossbar, it seemed like."

"At first, I was up here over the summer, and I was kicking it just fine off the ground. Then I came up here for two-a-day camps, and I was just struggling. I think it's more mental than actually just kicking the ball. You've just got to get used to it, and I'm getting there, actually, so it's better."

Rheem also had to deal with the possibility that he might redshirt the year and never take the field.

"It does, because if you're going to redshirt, you kind of get that lazy attitude like, 'I don't want to be here, because I'm not even going to play.' But they told me there was a really good chance that I'd probably get in there," Rheem said. "So I had to keep on going and get better so that if I did have that opportunity, I'd be ready."

Rheem might be ready to not only kick extra points, but also long field goals. His range in high school was about 50 yards, and he is beginning to reach that mark in college.

"Right now, 50 yards is within my range," he said. "But outside of that, I would have to hit the ball pretty good."
